Every week you see food ads shouting low prices. Each store claims that its prices are lowest and advertises a few items to support the claim.

But you can't judge food savings on advertised "specials" alone. They represent only a small percentage of the hundreds of items you buy over a period of time. Savings on "specials" mean little if you pay higher prices on other food purchases.

It's on the "seldom-advertised" items where differences really show up.
