Fire Trucks Won't Make Runs

After today, city-owned fire trucks will not make runs into the rural district surrounding Cottage Grove unless voters in the rural district approve the budget voted on today. It's rather a bad thing to realize that your property may be sitting in the shadow of the city limit and yet if fire struck you would be out of luck.

Perhaps the thought of losing your home isn't as bad as the thought of your valuables or keepsakes being lost in case of a fire. At any rate the decision as to whether the rural area is to have fire protection rests with the voters at the Walker gym today.

No News Is Bad News

No news is bad news where schools are concerned, says the Oregon Educational Association. This is right according to our observation. If the school is doing a good job, one sees first of all, a live PTA organization on the field. Again if a school is doing a good job, it will get favorable publicity through its pupils.

More public interest is created where the operation of the schools are above board and where citizens take an interest in what the school board does. Except for the transaction of personal business, as discussing the merits of a particular teacher, meetings here have been open to the public and to the press so far as we know.

As far as we can remember relations between the schools and the press have been excellent and this is the way it should be because with such relations the chances are that the relations with the patrons are usually good. Because of pleasant relations, it does not always follow that we or the public approve wholeheartedly the way the schools are being conducted or put our stamp of approval on the way a particular problem has been solved in the schools.

That the public generally approves of the schools is attested by the fact that up to now, no school budget has been disapproved regardless of the increased costs.

We doubt if the public relations in the rural schools are as good as in the independent districts, because school matters have been largely taken out of the hands of local patrons. The matter of making the budget is lumped in a sum for some thirty rural schools in Lane county and although the rural school patron has a right to vote on the budget, he has no chance of singling out his own school budget and approving or disapproving it.

There is probably a reason why we have the present rural school law and it may have been due to the indifference of the public, but the fact that a patron of a particular rural school has little or nothing to say in the operation of his school, except vote for a board member he may not know or approve a budget he had nothing to do with.

Poor Political Hay Fodder

One of the greatest foibles of a highly-competitive two-party political systems, it seems, is that there must always be opportunistic minds and loose tongues that would make political hay out of fields of national endeavor which can ill afford the damaging delay of such efforts. The Salk polio vaccine case is a good example.

Public trust in what promised to be the medical discovery of this decade at least has been shaken deeply by the performance—or lack of it—by some of the vaccine. That some well-calculated re-evaluation of the procedures of the inoculation program is needed at this time is without question. That all responsible officials in properly authoritative branches of the government should contribute their abilities to mapping the program ahead likewise is without question. But criticism that is little more than the wagging of an accusing finger across the political fence seems grossly out of place. We can't help but feel that a few critics are cloaking themselves generously in the safety of hindsight as compared to the hazards of foresight in their attack on the manner in which Oveta Culp Hobby, secretary of health and public welfare, has contributed to the handling of the Salk inoculation program.

Victory for Dr. Jonas Salk and his co-workers seems too close; and the promise of immunity from paralysis and death for thousands of young Americans is too great to let this wondrous rainbow be blotted out by political storm clouds. Again, let our public officials exercise every precaution to assure safety of the vaccine; but above all, let millions of parents hold to the hope of confidence in America's methodical scientific achievement rather than to the oftentimes whimsical designation on a political registration card.—Gresham Outlook.

Political Sniping

It seems to us that in this time of world crisis, a member of congress would refrain from political sniping and yet this is being done every day by the amateur outs. We mean by this that members of the party not in power are working pretty hard in some instances to try and block measures designed to promote international good-will or domestic good-will.

We have noted that the real leaders of both parties have stayed pretty well away from personal backbiting, some of the amateur congressmen so ambitious to promote the interest of their party, will do most anything to discredit the opposite party, regardless of what it does to us internationally.

Garden authorities are finally getting around to admit home-grown vegetables may not be quite as cheap as you could buy them at the market, but the pleasure of serving them up piping fresh is worth the extra cost. Which of course is the only excuse that Dad's been waiting for to lay down the hoe for the casting rod to hook those trout almost as cheaply as he could get them at the market, but which taste twice as good for being so newly dispatched from the invigorating stream.

Been too busy to go fishing so far this season ourselves and haven't heard too many reports on the success of others. But rumor has it that the same old experts still are bringing home full creels as usual and the amateurs—to which class we belong—still fish for the sport of it.—Gresham Outlook.

Letter From Washington

Political Partisanship Not in Statehood Vote

By Congressman Harris Ellsworth

An interesting thing about the house action on the bill to give statehood to Alaska and Hawaii was that political partisanship was not involved in the decision. The bill was a combination bill which included the two territories. Under the rule adopted by the house for the final consideration of the bill, it could not be amended on the floor. The vote was required to be for or against granting statehood to BOTH territories.

Both political parties have, in their national platforms, approved statehood for both Alaska and Hawaii. Although the floor debate was vigorous both for and against the bills, the fight was not on party lines.

Some members opposed statehood for either territory. Many were willing to vote for Hawaii but not Alaska. A few were favorable to Alaska but objected to admitting Hawaii.

Whatever the personal reasons of the members for opposing statehood, they voted 218 to 170 to recommit the bill to the committee—in other words, to end consideration of the statehood problem for this session.

Legislation to provide an increase in pay for postal employees has had a long and troubled history—not only in this session but last year also. Both houses of congress have again (the President vetoed a pay raise bill at the end of last session) passed a bill and sent it to the President. As this letter is written it is not known what the final result may be. It is thought likely that the bill will meet with a veto. Will both houses of congress vote the two-to-one majority necessary to override a veto?

As I understand it, the objection to the postal pay bill as it was finally worked out in conference between the house and senate, does not come from the amount of the increase. The objection of the Postmaster General is that the increases are not equitably made as provided in the carefully worked out house committee bill which was drastically amended by both the final house version and the bill passed by the senate.

The bill making appropriations for flood control, rivers and harbors and reclamation projects is now being finally drafted by the committee. I have appeared and given testimony before the committee showing the justification and need for funds on such projects in our district. I hope the bill will include those items.

Cominco Develops Newer Fertilizer

(TRAIL, B. C.)—Ammonium sulphate, a well-known and popular chemical fertilizer, can now be had in a new non-caking form according to an announcement released recently by The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited. An old timer in the chemical fertilizer field, ammonium sulphate has always been subject to caking. When this occurs, it causes considerable inconvenience to the farmer.

To solve this problem, Cominco instituted an intensive research program which has now been brought to a successful conclusion. The company's ammonium sulphate is now treated by a process which coats the individual crystals to produce a fertilizer which is free flowing under all normal conditions.

Cominco is one of the world's largest fertilizer manufacturers, turning out just under 700,000 tons of various fertilizer products last year with an ever greater production, due mostly to development in the liquid fertilizer field, forecast for this year. The company's large output of ammonium sulphate is marketed mostly in the western United States.

To the Editor: A few weeks ago I questioned the definition of "lemati" used in a recent interesting story on Cottage Grove appearing in the Oregonian's Northwest Magazine. The word, reminding me of the time the east side of Cottage Grove was known as Lemati was defined as meaning mountain. My recollection was that the old pioneers, of whom I interviewed many while editor at Cottage Grove, said the meaning was "across the water" or "across the river." Each of the communities was across the river from the other.

I have searched all the Chinook dictionaries available in Portland and have failed to find any giving the word "lemati" at all. "Lemiti" and "lemanti" are given as meaning "mountain." However, in a scrap book of mine I find a clipping of a story by me which appeared in the Oregonian, issue of December 11, 1927, in which I said the definition was "across the water" or "across the river." That statement never was disputed by any pioneer or other resident of Cottage Grove.

If "lemati" were jargon for mountain, wouldn't it better have been applied to the west side of the river, where Mount David comes down to the city boundary?
ELBERT BEDE,
Portland, Ore.

Thanks to your paper and its wide-spread circulation, we are reaping the benefits in our annual cemetery cleanup of the Masonic IOOF cemetery since we have had a fine response to our appeals for financial aid so we may hire the necessary labor. Just send us the amount necessary to take care of your lot and its surroundings and anything remaining will be applied on general work of which there is always plenty.

If you prefer to do your own lot, we beg that you please remove all trash and don't pile it in alleys, at the foot of trees or along the fences. Take it with you when your work is finished. We cannot pick it up for you unless you pay us. We do have to pay our helpers who are anxious and eager and efficient but refuse to work for nothing. Can you blame them?

Tin cans and broken bottles do not enrich tree roots. Only God makes trees but man or woman piles trash under them. It is a camel which sticks its head in a sand, hoping it is hidden. Tin cans just don't vanish unfortunately, neither are they invisible. Also please don't pile trash against the fences. We cannot burn it up without burning the fence posts. In other words, please remove all trash when through cleaning your lots. Practice the golden rule and don't pile it onto some one else's lot. This goes for the sexton, too. Don't get reckless with the dirt dug from graves, leave it at least on the lot it came from in the first place.

Thank you all for all the help given by all public spirited lot owners. If I make some mistakes, don't be too hard on me either, we who work up there are only human. To err is human, to forgive divine. Thanks.
Miss Belle Burkholder,
Supervisor, 225 N. Lane St., Cottage Grove, Ore.
