Reflections . . .

Experience Pays But Who Collects?

A baby comes into the world without inhibitions or experience; he quickly learns that a lusty yell brings instant relief—that's his first experience. Later, at home he is led to believe that he is invincible; during the first few days at school experience teaches him that he isn't. In business, experience teaches him hard and unbreakable lessons; he must give value received for expended time, services or merchandise—lessons never forgotten. Now he realizes that experience pays or subtracts; unscrupulous practice subtracts while honor pays like a gift edged bond. Beyond this payment experience leaves a trail marking the path for those who follow him. This is the plus, the extra dividend.

Experience lays down fundamental laws to break those laws one finds himself in the mire of hopeless defeat; to abide by them one collects bountiful rewards.
