Bosses Rate Older Folks Good Workers People who stay on the job in their sixties and seventies can be good workers and usually are, according to authorities who should know - their supervisors. In a University of Illinois survey, supervisors in 20 companies rated 1,025 older workers with these results. In over-all performance, 16% were excellent, 32% very good, 36% good. Seventy percent were absent less often than their younger colleagues, and 23 had about the same number of absences. Fifty percent were rated more dependable. In work quality, 57% did about the same and 36% were better. More than 75% turned out as much work or more than younger employees. And 60% got along with others as well as young people did, while 33% got along better.

MEMORY Lane

Remember when an entire community was served by a "party line" telephone? Aunt Fanny's residence could be called by cranking three long and two short rings, and eavesdropping was a constant and popular pastime. Topics of discussion ranged from new babies, and setting hens to catsup recipes and remedies for horse colic. Remember?
