"What's that?" someone asked. "Crackpot."

Revolution in Church Design Means Huge Savings in Costs

Man has taken lumber as we know it and as Nature has grown it and converted it into huge arches, trusses and beams which can span a building large enough to seat 10,000 people without posts or supports.

Research has developed glues so powerful and so resistant to wear, weather and stresses that they can be used to glue together boards and two-inch dimension pieces of Douglas fir into beautiful curving arches long enough to span 210 feet.

In engineering wood, man can design it to almost any shape, such as the lovely sweeping and powerful arch, or the inspiring and powerful boomerang arch. He can build up a heavy heel section and let the pointed and cambered top of the arch or truss slim out.

Not only have these huge, glulamated arches and trusses put a completely new building material into the hands of the nation's architects, but they have brought great savings into church construction, and some even claim they have encouraged the present, tremendous boom in church construction, the greatest in the history of our nation.

For instance, the massive, sweeping arches are being made to serve both as a roof structure and as walls, which is a great saving. Instead of costly masonry work, the beauty and grace and texture of the beams and arches is being used as a decorative feature of many churches and exposed beams and equally beautiful exposed ceiling, purlins and bracing of Douglas fir or west coast hemlock add a charm and grace to church buildings and best of all they help contribute to the lowered costs.

Single copies of an informative booklet "Beautiful Churches of Today" may be had without cost by writing West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 1410 S. W. Morrison Street, Portland 5, Oregon.

There has been a virtual revolution in church design in the U. S. in the past decade.

It all stems from the development by Western manufacturers of a completely new building material—engineered wood.
