One of the great pleasures of going to the theater and also of seeing the big picture dramas is the opportunity afforded to renew acquaintance with old friends and favorites. D. W. Griffith, the wizard of filmdom, shrewdly divines this truth and has retained some of his best players in all his pictures. Several of the stars and favorites who helped to make "The Birth of a Nation" and "Intolerance" the greatest successes of their time are to be seen again in "Hearts of the World," which is considered by Mr. Griffith's severest critics to be the supreme triumph of his career up to this writing.
