TRAGEDY AND TRAVESTY.

Here is a near-tragedy which happened in an Oregon school.

A bright little tot, who had always headed her classes, suddenly, and with no apparent reason, began answering all of the teacher's queries by saying, "I don't know."

The teacher came to the conclusion that something must be wrong.

She held a consultation with the child. Between sobs she got the story of a broken spirit, of a wounded heart.

The little tot's playmates had made fun of her clothing because it was not as good as that of the other children. Finally she got so she could no longer stand the disapproving glances at her apparel when she arose at her seat in recitations. She decided that she could better stand low markings on her studies than optical criticism of her clothing.

The pathetic little incident points a moral for every school, for it is doubtful if there are any of them where there are not some who can not dress as well as others and where there are not some pampered maidens only too ready to sneer at the poorly dressed.

"All my schoolmates have these things," says the girl who wants something which her parents think unnecessary. That is the only argument she thinks necessary, and that argument quite often only naturally follows the example of elders who think more of what someone is going to say about their clothing, or about what they have, than they do about whether or not that particular thing is something they need or desire.

Seldom do we hear from school children, or from their elders, the remark, "Well, lots of others have no better, so I guess I can do with it also." Not on your life. We're just as good as the other fellow, and what he has we can have also.

Our public schools should be, above all places, a place where the pupils of rich and poor can meet on democratic equality. It is not the difference in financial condition of people which causes dissatisfaction so much as a display of superior wealth—the bragging it is, one might say—which is exactly what those children were doing who made fun of the other girl's shabby clothing.

To such an extent has this display of superior wealth gone, and to such an extent have girls who could not afford it gone in spang their so-called more fortunate schoolmates that, in many schools and colleges, school boards and faculties have taken steps to regulate and limit the dress of girl students—and it seems that the greater the mental education the less judgment the girls display in the matter of less—and the less judgment displayed the greater the display of lower limbs and upper portion of the body.

If we believe all we read, we must conclude that the ears alone are modestly tucked away from the masculine gaze—and that only probably to deaden the sound of masculine criticism.

In Spokane the girl's league of the high school put the ban on silk garments, expensive clothing, French heels, thin waists, thin undergarments and thick cosmetics.

Several of the colleges are including in their literature the warning that scantiness of attire and extravagance of clothing will not be permitted, because of the deteriorating influence upon college work.

In Houston, Texas, the police superintendent, after a careful study of the causes of crime, says that ninety-nine one-hundredths of crime may be laid to women's clothes, or lack of them. He is covering more with women's clothes that they have covered for some time and probably comes a greater deal further from telling the truth than does some of the feminine raiment proscribed by the report.

In New Orleans the fathers of two Catholic churches have issued edicts against the extremes in ventilated feminine attire and one of those fathers went so far as to order home for decent raiment a bride approaching his altar through an electric glare.

Churches and churchmen in this country and in foreign lands, are railing against the extremes in feminine styles.

We believe that the root of the evil is the desire on the part of the wealthy to be attired a little more in the extreme style, and a little less on the body, than someone else and the inability of the feminine to allow anyone else to do more modishly attired than she.

The school girl remark that she must have what her playmates have means that the growing girl is going to tread the same paths as those who have gone before, if permitted to do so. It would be refreshing to hear her declare that she will not be bound by fashion's edicts, that she is going to free woman from her slavery, but it seems that only an upheaval from above, such as the action of schools and colleges, church and churchmen will bring reform, if reform may, indeed, be looked for at all.

THE MARKET MEASURE.

A peculiar feature of the recent election in Oregon was the defeat by a tremendous majority of the market commission measure.

Comment which has followed this defeat would indicate that it is not the principle of a market commission which brought the measure's downfall. It was defeated even by the farming population, which demonstrates that the farmers will not vote legislation favoring their class if they believe the proposed legislation to be faulty, which explains the vote. The salaried positions created by the measure undoubtedly had much to do in sending it to the toboggan, but the possibility of giving too much power to the market commissioner probably encompassed the measure's defeat.

One of the greatest defects of the initiative is that after a measure is proposed there is no possibility of amendment, which is the strongest argument why legislation, even when put up to the people, should first go through the legislative grind, there to have faults discovered and errors corrected. This measure did not take that course, but it is now probable that it will be submitted at the next session and resubmitted at the next general election. The principle is a radical departure from age-old custom, but so is all real progress, and the measure should have the opportunity of again going before the people in a form agreeable to the agricultural population.

INEXCUSABLE BUNGLING.

The great American people have been kind in overlooking the bungling of the past few years which has produced an inefficiency of government at a cost of billions in taxation, but it is doubtful if they will as readily overlook the governmental blundering which resulted in the listing as shacks of many who served with the colors, some of whom died on a foreign strand, perhaps because of further bungling in the airgrant department and in the keeping-us-out-of-war department. Our money amounts to little. It buys little and we can't take it away with us, but the honor of one of our boys who served with the colors and made, maybe, the supreme sacrifice, is of no small import to the lad himself, if alive, or to the relatives if he be dead. Bungling inefficiency which has that result is cruel and inexcusable.

The president has issued his usual Thanksgiving proclamation, which also is the usual literary gem to which we have become so accustomed during the past eight years, but we look in vain for any reference to the results of our recent election, the greatest cause for rejoicing on the part of the greatest number of people, and to which President Wilson, with his great facility of expression, alone could do justice.

Do You Need Glasses?

Moody's Deep-Curve Kryptok Lenses Are Better

Don't attempt to answer this question because you can't tell. That's my business—to examine eyes accurately and tell whether or not glasses are required. If you don't need them, I will say so frankly. If you do, those I prescribe will be exactly right and will cost no more than you would have to pay elsewhere—perhaps less.
