Sewing offered

Two college transfer courses in home sewing, Beginning Clothing and Clothing Construction, will be offered winter term.

The classes were canceled last term because only six people signed up but student Cathlene Brown is hoping to get enough students interested so they can be taught this term.

Brown feels that even for those who already sew, the lecture value of the class is important.

"In order to get a garment that doesn't look like you sewed it yourself, you have to know things you can only learn from an expert seamstress and Eleanor Stubbs (instructor for the classes) really knows what she is talking about," said Brown.

Students in the class will be sewing with fabric containing wool fiber because, according to Stubbs, you can get a better fit with wool, it drapes better and it's the new "in" thing.

Lined or unlined skirts, sleeveless vests will be featured in beginning sewing with collared jackets and pants taught in clothing construction.

New media classes

Larry Sturholm, Portland broadcaster, journalist and novelist, will be teaching a class within the journalism curriculum winter term at the College. Introduction to Broadcast Journalism (J131) will be taught by Sturholm on Thursday evenings from 7 to 10 p.m.

Another journalism class new to the curriculum winter term will be Introduction to Mass Communications (J211). A professional in the newspaper field, Cheryl Beshears, editor of the Tigard Times, teaches this course at 8 a.m. MWF.

"Both these classes are good for students interested in journalism and broadcasting (television and radio)," said Randy Clark, journalism instructor. "All of our journalism classes at the College are transferable to four-year institutions and some could satisfy humanities requirements."

Other journalism classes offered winter term are Journalism Projects (J199), Reporting II (J217), Publications Lab (J215) and Offset Newspaper Productions (J199V).

Crafts fair returns

The College will feature another Arts and Crafts Fair due to popular demand.

The fair has been a big success this year, according to Barbara St. Mary, Associated Student Government publicity director.

A Christmas-time fair was requested by the students so they could purchase handmade gifts for family and friends.

The College's art department will also be involved in the fair. Many of the students will be selling their paintings and drawings.

The fair will be in the CC mall Dec. 7, 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Library services

For people who are unaware of the complete facilities the library has to offer, there is a section located behind the front desk that contains all the information about events, meetings and laws that pertain to the College, and are available to the public.
