Women's Center supports By Doug Vaughan Of The Print Creating assistance for people in transition women who are in need of Creating assistance for women who are in need of help is one of the main concerns for Jane Greene, director of The Women's Center located just off campus at 19241 Beavercreek Road.

The main purpose Center is in existance is the in-crease of women who are in new situations such as becoming a single parent, and who need help in the transition. Greens uses the example of women who have been mar-ned most of their life and their nusband dies unexpectedly. She feels there are a lot of women who have never worked in their life, nor have made any traditional crucial decisions and suddenly are called on to make them. They become lost emotionally and will be faced with important financial and legal decisions that women have not traditionally made, Greene said. She recalled situations where some women had never driven a car before or even written a check. This is where the Center can help.

"Support is available. We can put them into a group with others in the same situation," Greene said. "It (the Center) helps some people become much more functional. Once you make steps toward the transition it makes you feel better about yourself."

A concern of Greene's is that all the confusion will hit the victim at once and become very devastating. She explained that if the transition is not made, many stress diseases will hamper the individual. She said that the body produces these diseases in a situation of continued stress. One of these diseases is alcoholism. In women, alcoholism is usually tied to a specific situation, whereas men will be stricken gradually.

The Women's Center is often confused with the

The Women's Center is often confused with the Women's Resource Center located in the College's Community Center. But to Greene it is no major problem because the two centers try to work together.

"We work hard to coordinate our programs," the Center Director said. "When they get people in crisis situations they will refer them to us, and when the people are ready (to function in society) then we send them back up there."

them back up there."

One of the vital characteristics of the Center is that there is no required fee on many of their services. They can also arrange low-cost counseling for an individual if it is needed. Greene feels that this is important due to the economic situation of many of their clients.

"When you don't have an income you become depressed and lose all of your energy," Greene said. "One of the characteristics of depression is lack of energy. It is scary to use a system that you are not familiar with. We can provide legal help so they can stay in touch with what is available."

The Center is very grateful for the help the College has provided. Greene feels that if it was not for the College's support there is a possibility that the Center would not exist. The house that the agency is located in is owned by the College, and many of their supplies are also donated by Clackamas. At this point the Center has been dependant on donations both from other organizations and individuals. She realizes that no one can afford very much but if it was not for the support of the community the Center would not be able to function.

As of January 1983 the organization will become a member of the United Way Agencies. Therefore, the Center will receive funding each year if they continue to provide the services that they do now. The funding usually makes up about one-third of an organization's budget, but since the Women's Center will be a newcomer they will receive slightly less.

group sessions and individual counseling the Center also offers courses. They are now offering a course for women who want to make a change in their life called "Assertiveness." They provide stress management course nd a "Women as Winners" and a class. The newest one is a class on decision making and self-awareness, "Creating awareness, "Creating Choices." The class will deal with a problem that is facing many older women who grew up with the goal in life to get married and raise a family. Greene feels these women lose their identity and it is hard for them to figure out what they want out of life. The newest developing program is a class for men. Twenty percent of the calls received by the Center are from men who are violent and cannot control it, Greene said. There is only one place in Portland that provides treatment for these men and there is nothing at the Center yet.

Space is also a problem nagging the Center. The college is donating a trailer to them but the Center is hampered by the problem of transporting it. The organization is also in the process of buying a new shelter home and is sponsoring a new center in Estacada.

The staff of the Center includes three paid employees, while over 40 people volunteer their time. The Center is in the process of hiring a receptionist, but it is projected that 93 percent of the work done is volunteer.

Right now the Center is at its peak of service due to the nearing of the holidays and the overflow of end-of-the-month callers. The Center has a 24-hour crisis hotline that receives approximately 25 calls per day. The use of the Center varies on many different things. Greene explained that violence goes in cycles. The beginning and end of the month are the busiest times while the holidays draws even more responses. She feels that more calls will be coming in as the economy continues to falter. It is estimated that for every percentage point of unemployment, violence increases five percent. She said three other contributing factors to violence are paydays, the moon cycle and weekends.

The Center has grown considerably through the past five years, but Greene feels that it will not continue at the same pace.
