Early classes dropped in new fall scheduling

by Mary Prath
Staff Writer

Next fall, Tuesday-Thursday classes will be on a different schedule, and will start at 8 a.m.

There are several reasons for this change. "Looking over the statistics of the last three years I could see that students were not attending the 7:30-9 a.m. classes," stated Lyle Reese, Dean of Instructors. "We were losing students to the 8-9am class as well," continued Reese.

"The new schedule will allow three slots for classes on Tuesday and Thursday mornings for the student who works afternoons or nights," stated Reese. The old schedule had three time slots as well, but students were often not willing to get up that early to attend a 7:30 class.

A few of the classes placed in the early time slot this term are English Composition, Technical Report Writing and Human Relations.

The college hour, which is the time slot set aside for faculty meetings, as well as student meetings, will be 1:30-2:30 p.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays. There will be two classes in the afternoon as well, the first one starting at 1:30p.m. and ending at 3p.m. and the other one starting at 3p.m. and ending at 4:30p.m.

U. of O. signs transfer agreement

by Heleen Veenstra
Staff Writer

The University of Oregon has signed agreements with several Oregon Community Colleges for block transfer and Portland State University has proposed such agreements also.

The agreements "won't impact the student one way or the other," said Art Hames, Counseling Director

The agreements "just formalize the existing process." The transferring process has been there for about 20 years. The agreements are a written document of the process.

Hames expressed that the students will see no difference with or without the agreements. The Community Colleges' course work will transfer. The problems won't be in transferring, but how it will count as transfer credit.

The main purposes of the agreements are publicity and to "get legislature off their case."

Hames said that with the agreements there is an official document so the schools can say to the legislature "look what we've done."

The University of Oregon has signed similar agreements with Central Oregon Community College in Bend, Umpqua CC in Roseburg and Southwestern Oregon CC in Coos Bay.

Bob Hulsuy coming up

The counseling appointments for students who went to the one day orientation at the beginning of the term are coming up.

Bob Hulsuy from Western Oregon State University will come to Clackamas Community College and go over three things. One year educational plan, career readiness inventory and study skills evaluation.

Students will have the opportunity to talk with Hulsuy.

Bernie Nolan said the advantage of having counseling appointments late in the term is that students usually have questions in the middle of the term instead of in the beginning, so now the counselors are able to answer questions.

"The best thing that a student can have to insure success is a pretty clear goal so they know what they are doing."
