In 'Pictionary' competition

Print staff creates mystery art

"Is it a face? The cheeks, yes, it's got to be the cheeks, come on don't laugh, draw, we don't have a lot of time left. Are you sure it isn't cheeks? What are you drawing? Dark cheeks? Oh, it's a blush."

This is one of the situations that might occur when playing the game "Pictionary." What exactly is "Pictionary?" It's a game like "Password," but instead of guessing the word after the other player gives a clue, the players have to guess what picture their teammate is drawing.

The game is divided into five categories, P- Person/place/animal (or related characteristics), O- Object (things that can be touched or seen), A- Action (things that can be performed events), D- Difficult (challenging words) AP- Any Play (this can be any type of word).

Some of the rules are: An all play word preceded by a triangle (each team can play), the picturist position rotates every time a team makes a sketch, the teams move on the board when throwing the dice and have to sketch guesses.

At a recent Print staff party this game was played. We came up with some pretty weird sketches and so I'll leave it up to you guys to guess what some of the pictures are. This game is really fun, especially with a large group of people.
