Guide to the tournament

For the past few weeks you've heard us refer to the playoffs as the NWAACC tournament.

That tournament starts tomorrow so it's about time you knew exactly what it is.

First of all, the top four teams in each of the four divisions in the NWAACC compete in a mini tournament, which determines the number one and two seeds from their division. Example: Clackamas won the Southern Division's tournament and Umpqua won second, therefore, Clackamas is seeded first and Umpqua is second from the Southern Division in the women's tournament this year.

One footnote to that is that the division winner is automatically in the NWAACC Tournament, the mini tournament is there for the purpose of determining seedings.

When the seedings are set, the first round is ready to begin.

In that first round, the number two seed from the Northern Division competes against the number one seed from the Southern Division. The number two seed of the Southern Division plays the Northern Division's number one seed.

Also in the first round, the Eastern Division's second seed contends with Western's number one seed, and Western's second matches up with Eastern's number one seed.

Thursday's action trims teams down to four, and by Friday night the top two teams in the Northwest are revealed. Also, in Friday's games, Thursday's losers compete in a consolation round, which will award the winner with fourth place. There is also a game between the two teams who were beaten in the second round by the final two teams which is worth third place.

This year's tournament is different from last year's when the division winner had a direct route to the Tournament and there was no mini tournament, just a playoff game to decide the final four participants in the tournament.

Both men's basketball coach Royce Kiser and women's coach Phil Garver voted against the new system because "it doesn't really help the team who wins their division," according to Garver.

The wrestling playoffs are much different. The nation is divided into regions and each region has a qualifying tournament, where that region sends a set number of competitors to the national tournament.
