High regard

There is always something going on at Clackamas Community College and the Cougar Print has always been on top of things. That's the American way of journalism; 100 per cent effort 100 per cent of the in spite of our gargantuan effort to give the students the information possible, there is one person on campus who does the work of ten and never complains about his outrageous work load. That person is me. And that feels good. I get so tired of saying we and in these editorials instead of I, me or mine. I am responsible for all that goes on here. I am put up with a bunch of idiots and ingrates who know one end of a typewriter from another. Yet in their faults (faults I could list for hours) I have the highest regard for them that I can give to lesser life

In any rate, the purpose of this editorial is to let the concerned young people of today know that I am deeply concerned about your right to all the information I see fit to give to you.

I don't care enough about personal glory to ingratiate myself like the fact that Dr. Hakanson has taken bribes that his wallet has turned green. Nor do I care at any point in following up the real drug problem on campus, the one in the campus security department. I mean of course there was the time that the faculty had their big post-finals orgy in the intimate dining room in the cafeteria.

That's not news. The really important news is board meetings and student government meetings. That's where the interesting stuff is to be found. Not only that but stories about these events are much easier to read and, as I've told you before, my staff couldn't get them out of a paper sack.

Thank you for your indulgence with this once eccentric in my otherwise flawless character.

The recent allegations that the Clackamas Community College Campus Security staff has been dealing in drugs seems to be substantiated by the picture on the left as Security Chief Johnson scores a high grade envelope from Manila. On the right, one security staffer works as an undercover narcotics agent. Undercover surveillance is security's main method of acquiring drugs.
