Lytle captures ASG presidency

by Christopher L. Curran
Editor-in-Chief

Garrett Lytle was overwhelmingly elected Associated Student Government President in the ASG elections for the 1989-90 school year.

Current ASG Senator Tim Jones was elected to the vice presidential post, in a race with an unusually high turnout rate.

The results of ASG Election '89 will not be official until validated by this year's ASG in their meeting Thursday afternoon. Last year's election results were marred by a charge that Faith Taylor had campaigned at the polls. A hearing ensued, and Taylor was found innocent of the charge. Barring any such difficulty this year, Lytle and Jones will be sworn in as the 1989-90 ASG president and vice president.

Lytle claimed 175 of the 272 votes cast for president, relating to 64 percent compared to Stephen Rudometkin's 89 votes, or 32.7 percent. Nine write-in ballots were cast for six other selections.

"I think there was a mixture of concern after this year's government," said Lytle, a drama major, regarding the high voter turnout.

Jones triumphantly collected 69.3 percent of the votes for the vice presidential post. Of the 261 ballots cast for vice president, Jones collected 181 of them to snare the victory away from Gertrude Amundson, ASG administrative assistant, who claimed 76 ballots accounting for 29.1 percent.

"I feel good about winning," said Jones. "We had posters up all over campus."

The voter turnout this year was among the highest in the history of ASG elections. Last year the number of ballots cast for president were 184 and there were 159 for vice president. There were three candidates vying for president last year. Faith Taylor's winning count 72 votes last year would have fallen short of Rudometkin's 89 this year.

Lytle was happy with the result of the vice presidential election.

"I think his (Jones') and my styles are similar," said Lytle. "We're similar in how we think. I think it came out alright."

Lytle and Jones will spend the next few weeks selecting the other three officers for next year. Shortly after that, all five will take a weekend retreat to outline a series of goals for next year.

Faculty input on new facility questioned

by Christopher L. Curran
Editor-in-Chief

The question of the amount of input that the faculty will have in the planning of the new classroom building, supported by the passage of the March 28 bond levy, has recently surfaced.

The Clackamas faculty senate has discussed the issues of input by the faculty, and the possibility of switching architecture firms. The architectural firm of Barrentine, Bates and Lee is currently used by Clackamas when construction is facing the college.

"We had been hearing rumblings... people under their breath," said Dave Madsen, Drafting/Manufacturing/AutoCAD chair and the faculty senator who brought up the issue to the faculty senate. "We opened the issue up to the faculty senate and a lot of people had opinions regarding the issue."

The issue that the faculty is most concerned with is having input on the planning of the 37,000 square foot classroom building to be built.

"We need to have the maximum allowable input to insure the classrooms (in the new building) are the best possible design for education," said Don Hutchinson, math and computer science instructor and faculty senate president. "The college is going to be doing some building. The senate wants the college to do the best job that can be done." The senate feels that their input would make that "best job" possible.

"We want to be sure that we get the facilities to suit our needs," said Madsen. "Instructors want their input to be listened to more carefully."

Barrentine, Bates and Lee has handled three major construction assignments for the college--the Harmony facility, the Pauling Center, and the remodeling of the Barlow Learning Center.

"We (the faculty) did not have adequate input in the remodeling of the Barlow Learning Center, said Cyndi Andrews, chairperson of the Barlow Learning Center. "It could be due to the style of the previous administration. Sometimes it's hard to separate the architectural firm from the administration."

"We want to look at the process and critique the process," said Clackamas President John Keyser, regarding the planning of construction or remodeling of a facility. "We'll keep the process open and give people (faculty) a chance to get ideas through (to the architect)."

A meeting was held April 25 where staff could give input into the planning of the new facility.

"This time it appears that we'll have input," said Andrews, "I hope the changes of administrative style result in the architectural firm listening to us."

"If we're going to build a facility, we want to be sure that we get a facility to suit our needs as instructors," said Madsen.

According to a report from Administrative Dean of College Services and Planning Bill Ryan in the April 18 President's Council, switching architects would delay the completion of the new building by at least six months. Therefore, college administrators, including Ryan and Keyser, have decided to stay with Barrentine, Bates and Lee.

"We'll gather all the input and give the architects some time to put together a plan," said Keyser. The college will look over the plan late this summer.

Clackamas officials hope to break ground on construction of the new building by the summer of 1990.
