Election results made official tomorrow

that he hopes to keep their support.

Ken Ingram said that the elections obviously didn't turn out how he would have liked them to. "If students are happy with the way the elections turned out, then that's great. If not, they should work for a change.

Luehring, ASG vice president-elect, would like to get "even more students involved next year" as ASG vice president.

"If there is anything bugging any of the students or making them angry they should come forth because that's what ASG is for. It's for the students." Jim Olson, the other vice presidential candidate, was not available for comment.

The results and the positions of these candidates will not be made official until the ASG meeting.

Students have until 5 p.m. today to turn in any "violations" of constitutional regulations which they think may have taken place during elections. The "violations" need to be in writing and must be turned into the ASG elections officer, Heidi Stardig.

There are at least two petitions being passed around, now, by different students. Whether they will be filed, or not, remains unknown. One of the petitions states that, during the elections, there were some constitutional regulations violated, including voting procedures and other campaign rules.

The CCC student handbook

states that if a violation of any kind occurs, during the elections, the student body and/or ASG have a right to take action on the violation.

If someone turns in a violation that was made by a candidate, ASG will hold a special hearing and vote on the violation. The person who was elected to the position could be disqualified. The other candidate would fill the vacant position.

If there was a violation made in voting procedures, such as students not being required to sign the poll book when voting, ASG could vote to overthrow the entire election and run a new election.

"Students always have a right to question," stated Kylo, "but it's up to ASG to decide on it."

The speech team at CCC has shown their talent at the last to competitions they attended.

In the Tom McCall tournament, which was held at Clackamas Community College, "the cougars gave a great home effort." The following people received awards: Mary Scott came in fourth place in sales; Todd Alexander took first place in editorial commentary, and third place in impromptu; Sara Lack came in third in persuasion, third in extemp advocacy, and fourth in editorial commentary.

In the Jr College Championships, held in Eugene, April 27 through April 29, the CCC speech team showed their talent once again. In this event, Clackamas' competitors came in as follows: The debate team of Tara Remmen and Todd Alexander took third place in overall speaker points; Alexander placed fourth in impromptu; CCC took third place, overall, for the tournament.
