Cabin Fever and Turn It On are not the names of this season's hottest box office smashes. They are two works of art featured in The Art of the Found Object display housed in the Pauling Center. The show was kicked off with a "meet the artists" reception on Oct. 24 and will run through Dec. 5. Four Portland artists are involved in the showing: Mario Caoile, Margarita Leon, Mark Bornowski and David Selleck.

Rick True, a part-time design instructor here at Clackamas Community College, came up with the idea for the display. True often gives his students assignments to use "found objects" in their art.

"I tried to pull work for a very unique approach from different artists," said True when asked which artist's sculptures he chose to display.

The artists whose art is included in the show are Mario Caoile, Margarita Leon, Mark Bornowski and David Selleck.

Leon works with sticks which she finds in the woods and fashions mostly humanoid figures in bright colors, somehow sculpting in a sense of humor.

Selleck works in wood, metal, wire and shows a definite affinity for pounding pieces of metal, particularly nails in the heads of his figures in place of hair. His figures are mostly animals.

Metal is the medium of choice for Caoile. He pounds and welds the metal into sculptures that depict every day life.

The most contrast of both colors and artist style is shown in the work of Bornowski. He combines black and white pictures of two human figures with colorful objects such as a red checker piece and a pink latex balloon.

All four are well-established artists whose works are displayed in other galleries in the Portland area.

The first found object sculpture was done in 1908 by Marcel Duchamp. It was a urinal and was submitted as a joke to a European salon in protest of the salon's refusal to recognize all art forms.

Mark Bornowski's art piece is featured here. Bornowski combines human images with bright colors and other objects to create this work of art.
