Field trip to be taken to Eastern Oregon

Students from Clackamas will have the chance Thursday to spend four days watching nature in its full beauty.

John Snively, instructor of geology at Clackamas, has been taking students on a trip to a wildlife refuge in Eastern Oregon. He has been taking students since 1971. The group is made up of two classes. One is called Mount Nurr field trip class, and is a class made strictly for the trip. The other is a bird identification class, which is a night class, and students from it have the option of going on the field trip.

The Mount Nurr class is a one-hour science credit that is transferable.

"More than anything, people are after the experience of being there. The exposure to new and different things," Snively said.

This year, about 22 people are going. The numbers are split about half and half between the two classes. This number is lower than in previous years because of some errors in the class schedules. This year is the first time they haven't turned people away.

Normally there are up to 80 people that go, filling up three vans. Snively remembers that in the past they have had to use two Greyhound buses for the trip.

The students are gone for four days, April 20-24. They will spend most of the first day traveling because they stop along the way and talk about the sights. Their room and board doesn't cost them anything, except for the normal class fees. The housing is the old field station itself.

It is basically dormitory style, with hospital beds and a cook shack. The place where they stay was a field station for approximately 25 years.

The schools originally took over the refuge because the buildings where the students stay were going to be torn down. Since that time, various schools have taken trips there to watch nature in action.

While at the station, they spend most of their time observing animals, particularly birds. They take notes while on the trip. When they return, they do a formal write up, which determines their grade for the class.

"More than anything, people are after the experience of being there. The exposure to new and different things."

The Oregon division of the International Youth Hostel Federation (IYHF), part of the Hostelling International Club, is giving Oregonians a less expensive option for world travel.

Hostelling International-American Youth Hostels (HI-AYH) is the American part of IYHF. HI-AYH is a nonprofit organization that was created to promote international understanding through its hostels and educational travel programs.

Members can stay at any of over 5,000 hostels in more than 70 countries worldwide. The cost for staying in the hostels is, on average, $10-15, with a few exceptions like New York hostels that cost $22 and London, which costs $30.

The hostels are dormitory-type accommodations with separate sleeping quarters for men and women. Also, most provide self-service kitchens and/or cafeterias, dining areas and common rooms for relaxing. The local hostels also put on activities including from walking tours, barbecues and movies.

The yearly joining fee for IYHF is $25 for people over the age of 18. Besides use of the hostels themselves, you also get access to discounts on Alamo Rent-a-Car, 25-30 percent off Budget and Avis car rentals, savings throughout the U.S. and Canada in cafes, comedy clubs, ferry boats, etc. and other rate cuts all over the world in traveling expenses.

You will also get a local newsletter with information about activities and events put on for HI-AYH members, such as workshops on budget travel, sailing instruction and cycling trips.

The Oregon division of HI-AYH is just starting their newsletter and is having some trouble because of lack of staffing. However, the next newsletter should be out sometime in the next couple of months.

For more information about the club, you can contact: Hostelling International-American Youth Hostels, 733 15th Street, N.W. - Suite 840, Department 481, Washington D.C. 20005. Phone Numbers are: 1-800-444-6111 or (202) 783-6161

For information about your local chapter of IYHF contact the Oregon Council at: Oregon Council, 1520 S.E. 37th Avenue, Portland, Oregon 97214, 503/234-6317 (office) or 503/235-9493
