

Wonder Woman: Amazon princess saves the day

Continued from page 1

thing they didn't bargain for. The cave was actually an underground alien space ship using human waste to power its way home. Wonder Woman, able to translate any language, deciphered the aliens' language. She sent the creatures home, after she whooped a little alien butt and threatened to contact the Great Amijaji (the alien God) if they ever returned.

One alien said, "We knew you earthlings were superstitious about the millennium and we took advantage of it; we were going to take over your puny planet, and we would've if it hadn't been for Wonder Woman and the meddling Print staff."

The survivors were Michelle Mintirea, Wes Bailey and Chad Hansen. Apparently the other students died by being "sucked dry."

"The cause of death was a mix of inhalation, dehydration, and severe suction," said County Coroner Dick Williams.

"I was sitting on the toilet minding my own business when I felt a rumble, then a shake, finally a swoosh. I was sucked backward into the toilet, I passed out from the pain. I woke up and I was lying on something soft. I turned over and I realized I was on a pile of decomposing people. I just couldn't believe it," said Chad Hansen, student.

According to Clackamas engineers, the aliens adjusted campus toilet sensors so they had a more intense suction, sucking students in. The aliens timed it just right to go with the millennium.

Clackamas and the county engineering department will work throughout the remainder of the school year to repair the toilets to ensure student safety. Campus will remain closed until then.

ANGIE DASCHEL / Clackamas World News

Clackamas World News photographer Angie Daschel was lucky enough to snap this quick shot of an unidentified student being swallowed by a toilet. Daschel, however, was unable to save the girl. Nice work, Angie!

Twin sons born to CCC student in English class

SHELBI WESCOTT
Feature Editor

Clackamas sophomore Amy Wilcox unexpectedly gave birth to twin boys in the middle of Emily Orlando's American Literature class last Thursday afternoon.

Wilcox, who was eight months along in her pregnancy, said she felt some slight contractions, but attributed them to gas from eating a Chartwell's burrito a few hours earlier. It wasn't until contractions became more intense that she realized that she was actually going into labor.

"All of a sudden I felt my whole body wanting to push," Wilcox recalled. "So, I raised my hand and told Ms. Orlando what was happening."

The reactions among students in the class varied considerably. A few students wanted to stay to witness the birth, but many students took off running the moment they realized that Wilcox wasn't going to make it to the hospital and needed to deliver right then and there.

"I didn't want to watch a girl give birth," said Greg Anderson, a five year Clackamas veteran. "Especially on the desks where I put down my books and stuff... I don't want to think about that."

However, many other students stayed to offer their services in whatever way possible. Jeff Weiderman, a pre-med student, came to the rescue with his knowledge of Obstetrics.

"I just implemented all of the knowledge I had. I'm so glad that I was there to help her," Wiederman said.

Due to the speed of the birth, many improvisations were utilized. Orlando provided a letter opener to cut the umbilical cord, one student sucked the mucus and fluid from the boys' nose to allow them to breath and many students offered their clothes to wrap the children in.

"This whole experience was a first for me," commented Orlando. "There I was reading about William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury and all of a sudden I had real sound and fury in my classroom."

The infant boys were taken to Willamette Falls Hospital where they were announced healthy and normal. They weighed 6 lbs. 4 oz., and were named Salinger and Dickens, names inspired by their time and place of birth.

"I couldn't be happier," said Wilcox. "They mean the world to me."

Chartwell's claims victims

SALENA DE LA CRUZ
Sports Co-Editor

Clackamas Community College remains closed after a radioactive leak was discovered in the kitchen at Chartwell's.

"Once the police learned that Chartwell's was radioactive they quarantined the school," said John Thorry, automotive instructor.

The noxious fumes and chemicals coming from Chartwells was not the food, but in fact a radioactive substance with the power to turn people who ingested it inside-out.

With the turn of the century, something in the molecular structure of Chartwell's activated the deadly gases, turning many students into walking zombies.

More than 500 students remain in the hospital for observation in the aftermath of the threat.

Everyone had to get his or her stomach pumped and remain quarantined in the hospital.

"I just don't understand how it slipped by so many people," said Sgt. Doug Crane of the Oregon City Police Department.

Everyday students would order the food and it had a rather strange neon glow to it. The smallest idea from anyone would turn into action whether it was a joke or not. At night when they went home they would remember nothing.

Former ASG (Associated Student Government) President Jennifer Rankin was one of the victims in the radioactive sickness. Her removal from ASG has been attributed to this condition.

When Rankin drank at the conference, the idea was laughed upon by her friends. When she removed files, her nausea took over. Finally, when she was removed from office, her stomach cramps were the culprit.

With the new evidence the Rankin removal will be re-evaluated.

"I can't believe this whole concept was all brought about by a radio-active substance in the food," said Rankin.

"I knew something was up when no one was showing up for classes," said Ima Hough, instructor. "The sickness has resulted in much of the same action being taken; no one wants to eat at Chartwell's again."

"I never want to eat at Chartwells again," said Angie Smith, student.

"I never ate at Chartwell's to begin with; it sucked," said Sally Wesley, student.

It's the end of the world as we know
it. I feel fine.