

Bond: increased enrollment taking a heavy toll

The art department is housed in a 90 year-old building that floods almost yearly. The building was a Smucker's warehouse and office building until Smucker's donated it to the college in the late sixties. In its present location, rotting buildings, regular insect infestations and no air conditioning also plague the art program.

"It's a constant battle to even keep it going," said Rick True, art department chair. "Thinking about the potential for proper sculpture, and photography labs with proper equipment, is very exciting."

This year, enrollment in the computer science program is up 20 percent. Students must trek around campus between the fragmented spaces of the computer science department in the Streeter, Clairmont and Gregory buildings.

Some of the classes have been moved online because there is so little classroom space.

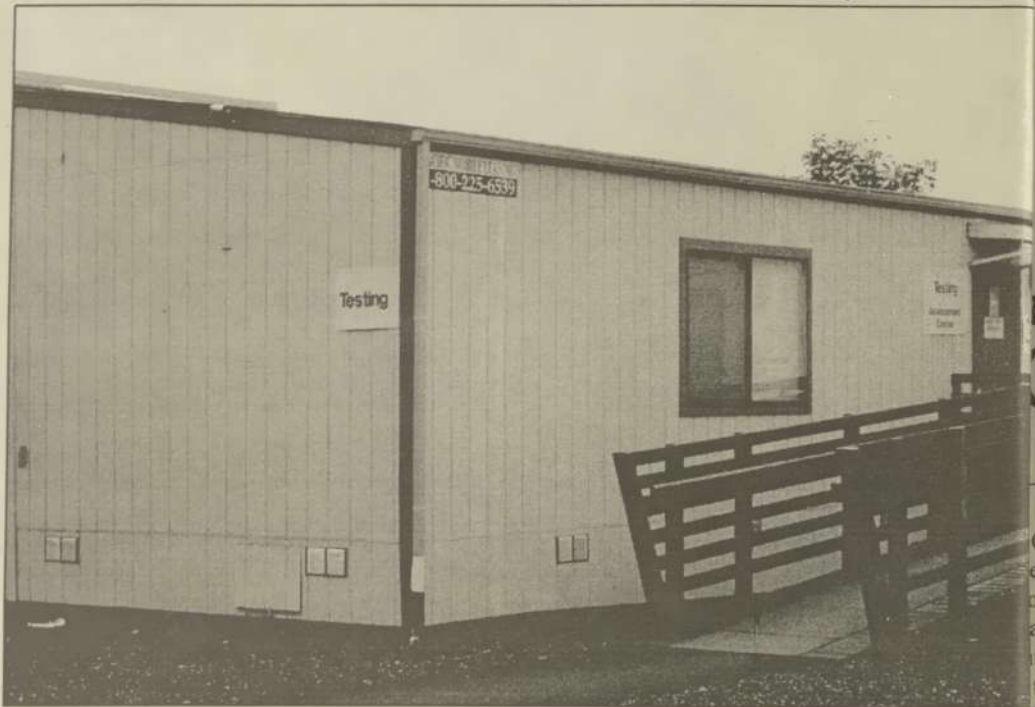

Nursing, automotive and nearly all other programs on campus are feeling the crunch that rapid growth in enrollment and technology have put on the college.

The only solution available to Clackamas, in addressing these problems, is the money the bond will provide, according to Keyser.

This would give us the only source of money we have to address the building concerns.
