Molly Stanley, a freshman from Portland Christian High School, was elected to the office of Associated Student Government President by a landslide vote, defeating Jason Gibson and a write-in candidate, Brian Everest.

Stanley received a total of 136 votes out of 199 total votes cast in the election held last week. Gibson, who ran an unorthodox campaign to try to reform the student government office, was a distant second with 33 votes. Everest, who began a campaign on Tuesday of last week, was third with 24 votes.

Erika Egger, a freshman who graduated from North Clackamas Christian High School in Oregon City, was elected by a large margin to the office of ASG Vice-President. Egger, a business major, defeated Stephanie Neuhauser by a margin of 128-66.

Gibson, contesting the election, had filed a grievance with the ASG office. A special election committee had been formed by the ASG leadership to look at any proposed allegations that the letter submitted by Gibson had implied.

According to comments made by ASG President Stefan Myers, the election subcommittee met in session on Tuesday, May 21 and decided that the allegations made did not violate any ASG constitutional bylaws and that the election would be declared official as of May 21.

A complete wrapup of the election, along with interviews with the winners and reaction from the losers, will be in next week's edition of The Print.
