Music and theater department faculty excited that new building moving forward as planned

As construction crews begin the process of mounting sheet-rock on the walls of the new Communication Arts building, the future occupants from the music department are pleased to report that their "production" is right on schedule.

Outside of the Dye Learning Center, in a space that used to be occupied by modular classrooms and one of the recently missing parking lots, a construction crew has been working for months to erect the new building. This new addition to the CCC campus will not only be the largest of the new buildings, but is also rumored to be "largest and most technologically advanced arts building built on any campus in Oregon in the last 10 years," according to Music Department Chair Tom Wakeling.

"Along with the theater," Wakeling said, "we will have two other rooms in which to perform: the Instrumental Rehearsal/Recital Room and the Vocal Rehearsal/Recital Room. Both of these rooms are set up with 'variable acoustics' in order to be able to 'tune' the room for different types of musical groups."

The "theater" Wakeling refers to will be a large, two-tier auditorium housed in the center of the new building. It will be used to host guest speakers, put on concerts for fundraising and community entertainment, as well as being the new home of the CCC Drama department.

The Drama department, in cooperation with CCC recording instructor Brian Rose, plans to shoot an original TV show in the new structure.

"We're going to do a series in the prop room behind the [new] theatre called 'This, Old Set,'" said Rose. The series will reveal many of the tricks and techniques used in building sets and props for television and theater.

Rose said he has many reasons to be thankful for the new facilities. As one of the newest instructors on campus, Rose has been operating his recording classes anywhere he could find.

"It'll be a lot easier to give assignments with our own studio," said Rose. "We can do labs during the day; we can't do labs here [in Randall]."

Rose, Wakeling and the rest of the arts faculty are already making early plans for the move next fall.

"The new building is on schedule and due to be completed sometime in October or November," said Wakeling. "We'll start teaching classes there at the beginning of winter term, 2005."

The theater in the new Communication Arts Building will be two-tiered with curved, amphitheater-style seating for an audience of about 400. Classes should begin in the building in winter 2005.
