THE HAUNTED HOUSES

Pirates: Isla De Los Muertos

If someone is looking for some real scares, he or she best keep out of this Pirates Den.

At the end of the day, it might as well be a set from the last Pirates of the Caribbean movie that is overrun by small children in black cloaks. There are a few trippy effects, but no real scares. It is a great, creepy exhibit for young children, but anyone over 10 will probably yawn.

Return of the Voodoo Woman

This exhibit gets an "A" for theatrics. After leaving a well-decorated bayou hut, visitors are cast into the abyss of a house. Its deepest parts are faintly reminiscent of the film People Under the Stairs. The ride is capable of inspiring a few chills – that is, until a zombie girl can be seen writhing around on bed sheets like she is in a bad Cher video. After realizing that if they were real zombies they would be trying to eat people and not walking past gurgling, the chills dissipate.

Hayden Institute for the Criminally Insane

If there is only money enough for one haunted house, this is the one to see. There are real scares, especially if movies like Silent Hill or The Grudge inspire even the faintest creeps. The turns and doorways are very unclear; they feel less like a walkthrough and more like an actual place where crazy, homicidal maniacs are forgotten. There is a bloody hallway that is an impressive element.

CarnEvil Funhouse and Freakshow

This attraction was a lot like walking through the hall in high school where all the goths and Juggalos (Insane Clown Posse fans) hung out. The only real thrill that can be derived from the funhouse is the one that comes after being accidentally fondled by one of the teenage actors. Young children will be traumatized but not entertained. The End.
