New Living-Learning Communities at OSU will focus on cultural identity

CORVALLIS, Ore. – Oregon State University is introducing two new Living-Learning Communities to the Corvallis campus this fall that will center on the experiences of Indigenous people and those with black and African American identities.

Living-Learning Communities (LLCs) are academic programs that collaborate with residential communities on campus to bring together students with the same academic focus and help them build relationships with faculty and advisors. In addition, University Housing & Dining Services holds events in the communities related to their areas of interest.

These are the first Living-Learning Communities at OSU focused on ethnic cultural communities. Currently, Living-Learning Communities range from specific disciplines like engineering and business to shared passions, such as environmental activism and outdoor activities.

The new Living-Learning Communities have partnerships with several cultural centers on campus. Both communities will be located on the first floor of Poling Hall, a residence hall in the center of campus. The programs are open to all students, regardless of identity.

The munk-skukum Indigenous Living-Learning Community offers a place for students to find community, explore cultural identity and learn more about the lands on which they will reside. The name “munk-skukum” means “to strengthen” in chinuk wawa, an Indigenous language originating as a pidgin trade language in the Pacific Northwest.

“When we speak about Indigenous communities as a focus, we are specifically talking about the Indigenous people of the Americas and Pacific Islands, while also balancing the integral responsibility we have to supporting an understanding and respect of Tribal sovereign nations,” said Luhui Whitebear, the Native American Longhouse Eena Haws assistant director, who is leading the munk-skukum group.
