There's a fungus among us, so says OSU, in fact there's not one, but two

New research has shown that a fungal pathogen that is causing the Swiss needle cast epidemic in Northwest forests is present in two forms -- and one form of the fungus may be more virulent and damaging than the other. Scientists working with the Swiss Needle Cast Cooperative at Oregon State University (OSU) presented information that the fungus causing the disease exists as two distinct genetic lineages. Continuing research will determine the implications of this for needle loss, reduced growth and tree death, said OSU. At least one of the fungal lineages has a worldwide distribution due to its movement on Douglas Fir nursery stock. So far the second lineage, which may cause the more severe damage, has been found only in the Oregon Coast Range, and it's not yet clear whether or not it also occurs elsewhere, said OSU. Large forest areas of Western Oregon and Washington are suffering from this disease, with the newest surveys showing 385,000 acres as being moderately to severely affected. It attacks only Douglas Fir trees, which form the foundation of the Pacific Northwest forest products industry.
