DHS receives bug-tracking federal funds

A new $1.5 million, threeyear federal grant will allow Oregon to develop and test a plan for tracking environmental health threats, according to public health officials at the state Dept. of Human Services (DHS).

The goal is to have its plan for linking environmental hazard, exposure and health outcome data ready by 2006, said Dr. Mel Kohn, state epidemiologist. He added that an nationwide system is also needed.

"This will help us protect the public's health, because we can begin to link environmental exposures with the occurrence of certain diseases," Kohn said.

"These data exist in a variety of places, but in the past we haven't been able to bring them together in a manner that allows for comprehensive analysis," said Kohn.

The Oregon Dept. of Environmental Quality will be a key partner because it collects data on air and water contaminants and other potential sources of exposure to environmental hazards, Kohn said, noting the Oregon Dept. of Agriculture and the Office of the State Fire Marshal are also important sources of information, according to Kohn. Additional information about the grant is available on the following Web site: www.cdc.gov/nceh/tracking/.
