

Iron Wills and Men of Leather- The story of the Lewis & Clark Expedition By DAVID C. HINZE

William Rogers Clark

William Rogers Clark grew up tough. He was the ninth of ten children and the youngest of six boys. The famous Revolutionary War hero George Rogers Clark was his oldest brother and personal hero. Virginian born, the family moved when he was 14 into the Ohio-Indiana territory to pursue land and business dealings.

Clark followed the family tradition and entered regular military service under General Anthony Wayne.

During this period Clark learned to lead men. He undertook several missions for the general into the south west and along the Mississippi River in southeast Missouri and southern Illinois. Perhaps because of his birth order or his personality Clark usually kept quiet and to himself. He was most at home tramping through the wilderness.

He learned the rough and tumble ways of the woods and the survival skills necessary along the frontier. During his military service he briefly became acquainted with a Virginian named Meriwether Lewis. Little did he realize then how intertwined the two men's future would become. Historians are unsure of their relationship during this period due to a complete lack of records.

Regardless of the evidence, it was obvious the two men came to respect one another's abilities. Both Lewis and Jefferson appreciated the danger of the trip and the need for another leader on the expedition.

Lewis immediately penned his old military friend and offered him the rank of captain and the chance to be an equal with Lewis during the journey. Balking mail service, and Lewis' continual movements, delayed Clark's eager affirmative response to the offer.

Lewis was embarrassed, and Clark a bit miffed, when snags inside the War Department finally sent Clark's commission. The paperwork listed Clark as lieutenant on the official roster instead of a captain. Much to their credit the two men never let on to anyone else and to everyone who came in contact with the Corps of Discovery the two men were co-captains.

Clark's strength lay in his ability to handle the wide range of personalities comprising the Corps. His word was his bond and he displayed nerves of steel in crucial situations. Surveying and journal writing proved to be two of his additional strong points, and it is from his journal we get the most complete picture of the adventure. While he must have had hundreds of questions and a few doubts on October 15, 1803, he stepped onto the keelboat at Clarksville, Kentucky and shook hands with Lewis.

From this moment forward they would be one of the most formidable teams in American history. Dave Hinze is a professional historian and tour guide. He leads tours and presents at conferences on Lewis & Clark, and other topics pertaining to early American history, for the American History Education Association.
