Better fuel economy Wyden goal

Regret at the House-Senate Energy Conference Committee's failure to adopt an amendment he offered that would increase automobile industry fuel economy standards by one mile per gallon each year for five years beginning in 2008 was expressed by U.S. Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), a member of the committee.

Wyden offered the amendment to the 2005 energy bill.

He described it as a concrete step the conference committee could take to improve the legislation to reduce America's dependence on foreign oil and reduce what he has called America's "terror tax." It refers to the portion of the price per gallon of gas that is indirectly funneled through foreign governments to Islamist extremists.

Despite all emerging consensus among experts and policy-makers from both ends of the political spectrum about the need for better fuel standards, Wyden said, the average fuel economy of cars on America's roads today has declined to the lowest levels in 20 years.

"As of today, the energy bill currently contains no significant provisions to reduce America's dependence on foreign oil," Wyden said.

"Congress should be taking steps now to improve America's outdated energy policies rather than simply maintaining the status quo," said Wyden. "Improving fuel economy standards in the transportation sector is one of the most effective tools for reducing our dependence of foreign oil, and the conference committee has failed to improve America's energy and national security by rejecting this modest, but important proposal.

"We are excited about the scope and potential impacts of this project," said Sara Magenheimer, public affairs specialist with the Natural Resources Conservation Service. "It presents technical, research-based information in an understandable, user-friendly fashion."

The project's nonlinear structure helps educators customize classroom, workshop or field instruction to meet the needs of specific audiences. It also empowers individuals to select the learning pace, media formats and content that work best for their own situation.

"The insights and stories of these Oregon land managers are really what bring this project to life," Braunworth said.

"They help viewers understand the connection between healthy natural resources and a profitable, sustainable operation."
