Big stink about bug

As colder weather drives certain insects indoors, the Oregon Dept. of Agriculture (ODA) is asking the public to help detect the presence of the brown marmorated stink bug, Halyomorpha halys.

The stink bug is a potentially serious pest of agriculture and can be an uninvited house guest in large numbers.

Last year, Oregon became the first state west of the Mississippi River to report the presence of the brown marmorated stink bug. In all, dozens of the exotic pest were detected -- many reported to ODA by Oregonians following a highly publicized pest alert.

Based on these reports, an established population of the bugs was confirmed by ODA and USDA's Animal Plant Health Inspection Service in the Ladd's Addition neighborhood of southeast Portland.

The presence of the insect has since been confirmed in other parts of Portland and could have possible spread throughout the Willamette Valley and other parts of Oregon.

The bug is native to Japan, China, Taiwan, and Korea. It was first found in the United States in 2001 and, until summer 2004, was confined to a handful of East Coast states. While similar in looks to Oregon's native stink bugs, the brown marmorated species could be especially troubling to the state because it has no natural predators, parasites, or diseases to help control its population.

Like several other insects in Oregon, including box elder bugs and Asian multicolored lady beetles, the brown marmorated stink bug likes to seek shelter in homes during the fall and winter months.

Where the bug has become established, it can enter homes by the thousands, which can be stressful and disturbing to residents, said ODA. These bugs are harmless to people, although as the name suggests, they can release an unpleasant odor when disturbed.

In an agricultural setting, the insect has an appetite for many crops and could be troubling to the tree fruit industry.

A Website containing pictures and a complete description of the pest can be found at oregon.gov/ODA/PLANT/alerts_index.shtml or the public can report to the Oregon Invasive Species Hotline at (866) INVADER.

To confirm a report, ODA requires a specimen. Details on preserving and sending suspect insects can be obtained by contacting the hotline.
