Cleaner outboards mandated

A recent survey indicates that Oregon boaters are ahead of the game when it comes to voluntarily converting their outboard motors

Some 40.6 percent are either low-emission or electric. The Oregon State Marine Board (OSMB) has encouraged boaters to upgrade to low-emission engines with the goal of having 75 percent of all outboards labeled low-emission by 2010.

Beginning Jan. 1, 2006, marine outboard motor and personal watercraft manufacturers must produce motors that are 75 percent cleaner than they were in 1996. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), working closely with the industry, adopted this change in 1996 to decrease the amount of pollution caused by carbureted two-stroke engines, said OSMB.

This rule does not apply to boat owners who currently own a carbureted two-stroke engine, or to the sale of new or used engines. Boat owners will be not be required to modify their engines, but newly manufactured engines must meet new standards.

The new engines cost approximately 10-20 percent more than the conventional engines, but the cost is balanced by reduced fuel consumption, low smoke and the environmental benefits, said OSMB. These new-technology engines create less exhaust, start more easily, accelerate faster, and produce less noise and fumes, it said.

"In the long run, these motors will help provide cleaner waterways for fish, wildlife, and people, and are more efficient for boaters," said Jyll Smith, OSMB public information officer. "Reduced emissions will help keep our waterways clean for future generations."
