

Governor Kulongoski calls for more state troopers, better security against identity theft, drug trade

More state troopers and greater protection against identity theft are among measures urged by Gov. Kulongoski to give Oregonians greater protection in a number of areas.

Speaking to county sheriffs, chiefs of police, and prosecutors from across Oregon, Kulongoski's statements encompassed adding more troopers on Oregon's roads, a new law enforcement task force to fight ID theft and electronic data crimes, and legislation giving consumers the ability to freeze thieves' access to credit information.

"The Dept. of Oregon State Police (OSP) plays a critical role in the fight against identity theft and our fight against meth -- which is often the motive for identity theft crimes," Kulongoski said. "Oregonians now have only a few ways to prevent misuse of their personal information, or to anticipate when identity theft may occur.

"We must do more," he continued, "so that Oregonians do not have to endure the economic havoc identity theft creates, and it's time we provide citizens the tools they need to protect their personal information and their families."

The governor told law enforcement leaders, gathered for a board meeting of the Regional Economic Crime Investigation Center, that he wants state lawmakers to enact the following standards:

*Increase Patrol, ID Task Force -- Many identity theft and electronic data crimes are linked to methamphetamine, so the fight against it and the fight against identity theft are connected.

In order to cut the small meth labs and importation of meth from across state lines, Oregon's major highways and interstate routes need 24-hour, seven-day-a-week full patrol coverage by OSP, the governor indicated. To help achieve the goal of 24-hour coverage on Oregon's roads and highways, 125 additional troopers are needed.

The governor also indicated the following:

Complementing the increased road patrol, Oregon also must have a strong role in fighting identity theft and electronic data crimes through a theft-and-electronic data crime task force (modeled after the gang and drug task forces, including local, state and federal criminal justice representation).

*Security Freeze -- Consumers must have the right to put a security freeze on their own credit files with credit reporting agencies -- whether or not they are victims of ID theft. Once a freeze is in place, the new law would require bureaus to obtain specific permission to release data from those files, in most instances.

Said Kulongoski, "A person who chooses this option would have added protection in the event of an identity theft, because the thief would not be able to open accounts or get credit in the victim's name.

"Credit information has a high street value among identity thieves, and files with a good credit rating and easy access are worth more money. If thieves can't use the information even if they have it, that street value goes away."

His observations also included the following:

*Safeguarding Personal

Information -- Any company or other organization that acquires, maintains, or uses personal information must protect it from misuse and dispose of it properly, once it is no longer useful.

Such information includes Social Security (SS) numbers and credit card account numbers.

*SS numbers -- A criminal can use SS numbers as the starting point for many ID theft crimes. The new law would prohibit businesses from displaying or disclosing those numbers, except as required by state or federal law. It also would prohibit businesses from requiring people to transmit their SS numbers over the Internet without encryption.

*Notification -- The new law would require businesses, government agencies, and other organizations that keep and use key forms of personal information to provide prompt notification to credit-reporting agencies and affected people if someone steals that information, or if someone accesses it for illegitimate purposes.

"I want to congratulate the sheriffs, chiefs of police, and district attorneys for the innovative work they're doing to protect all of us from identity theft," said the governor. "There is no silver bullet for identity theft, but if we take action to protect consumers at the front end, we can make the work of our law enforcement authorities a little easier when it comes to investigation and prosecution."

The governor directed the state Dept. of Consumer & Business Services to work with legislators and Attorney General Hardy Myers, who has also been active on this issue, to draft legislation.

He noted that California, Washington, and other states already have enacted similar measures to protect consumers from ID theft.

Kulongoski has asked the state's Congressional delegation to not support federal ID theft legislation unless it includes the basic elements of his own state legislation.

"If federal standards are weaker than what I have described, it is critically important that any federal legislation allow the states the latitude to adopt and enforce more stringent standards to protect consumers," the governor said.

According to the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), Oregon during 2004 ranked ninth-highest per capita among the states for identity theft complaints. During 2005 the state ranked 13th.

The Portland/Beaverton/Vancouver (Washington) metropolitan area ranked 22nd per capita in the nation among major metropolitan areas for 2005. Top locations in Oregon for identity theft complaints were Portland, Salem, Eugene, Beaverton, and Bend.

The top three types of identity theft activity identified were credit card fraud, fraudulent banking activity, and phone or utilities fraud.

The FTC's data is based on self-reported complaints, so officials believe that total incidents are greater than the number of complaints received by FTC. Because under-reporting is likely to occur at similar rates across the country FTC's data still offers useful comparisons among the states and metropolitan areas.

Vitamin C lessens E loss in smokers, study indicates

A new study has found that supplements of vitamin C can largely stop the serious depletion of vitamin E that occurs in smokers, demonstrating for the first time in humans "a remarkable interaction between these two antioxidants" working together.

The research also suggests a possible mechanism by which smoking can cause cancer.

The findings are being published in "Free Radical Biology and Medicine," a professional journal, by scientists from the Linus Pauling Institute at Oregon State University at Corvallis.

The results of the research were based on a placebo-controlled, double-blind clinical study with smokers and nonsmokers, and showed that supplements of 1,000 milligrams of vitamin C per day could reduce by up to 45 percent the rate of disappearance of one form of vitamin E in smokers.

In general, vitamin C supplements helped protect the function and plasma levels of vitamin E, so that smokers who took supplements had about the same level of antioxidant protection as non-smokers.

"A lot of nutrition research in the past has been done by studying one nutrient or another in isolation, sometimes with conflicting results," said Maret Traber, a professor of nutrition at OSU and lead researcher in the Linus Pauling Institute.

"What this and other studies like it are showing is that the protection we get from proper diet or supplements often comes from combinations of nutrients working together," said Traber. "This has implications not only for smokers but also for many other people."

Vitamin E is one of the first lines of defense in human lung tissue against the ravages of cigarette smoke, Traber said, which creates destructive free radicals. If the body has adequate levels of vitamin E, this protective antioxidant can interact with the peroxyl radicals created by cigarette smoke and prevent the destruction of lung membranes.

In this process, however, vitamin E can itself be made into a destructive radical. If adequate levels of vitamin C are present, it can help the vitamin E return to non-radical form and continue its protective role.

But in the absence of adequate vitamin C, this process breaks down. The new study is one of the first to ever demonstrate this phenomenon in humans.

This and other studies at the Linus Pauling Institute also have shown that in smokers vitamin E is being depleted from tissue concentrations to keep up its levels in the blood.
