Advantages of biomass energy cited

Thinning Oregon's overly dense forests and utilizing the woody biomass for renewable energy production can restore forest health and wildlife habitat, increase jobs and revitalize rural economies, Oregon leaders in forestry, utilities, the environment and government agreed.

Additionally, Cave Junction and Grants Pass are among areas identified for biomass power opportunities.

More than 250 people attended a recent daylong Oregon Woody Biomass conference preceding the Oregon Business Summit in Portland, where woody forest biomass also was on the agenda.

Biomass as a new dimension of managing forests was noted by Allyn Ford, chief executive officer of Roseburg Forest Products Co., and a director of the Oregon Business Council.

"This approach," he said, "can increase jobs and boost the forest sector's contribution to the economy, reduce dependence on fossil fuels, and reduce the risk of uncharacteristically severe fires that threaten our federal forests.

"Generating renewable electric energy and transportation biofuels from woody biomass is key to a 'triple win' strategy of meeting renewable energy and carbon emission goals, providing jobs in rural communities and restoring health to overstocked, fire-prone forests," Ford said.

Added Russ Hoeflich, vice president and Oregon director of The Nature Conservancy, "We must unite to strive for and develop a statewide vision of our forests and a bold plan to get there."

The statewide effort needs to be led by the governor and the congressional delegation, Hoeflich said, while parallel efforts at local levels are needed to fully engage affected communities.

The Nature Conservancy is advocating forest restoration that could bring back healthy conditions and provide an economic boost at the same time by creating jobs in rural Oregon communities, Hoeflich said. In Oregon, he said, more than 21 million acres, including 13.5 million acres of public land, most of it federally owned, needs active treatment.

Hoeflich said that restoring forests to healthy conditions will require treatment -- active fire management or biomass removal -- of 500,000 to 600,000 acres annually during the next 20 to 25 years, three to five times the current level.

The conference explored findings of a new woody biomass study commissioned by the Oregon Forest Resources Institute (OFRI). A map from the study identifies areas in the state where biomass, transportation access, the power grid and existing biomass facilities overlap.

The map shows major opportunities for Oregon in the communities of Cave Junction, Grant Pass, Medford, Glendale/Riddle, Roseburg/Glide, Klamath Falls, Lakeview, Gilchrist, Warm Springs, John Day/Prairie City, LaGrande/ Elgin and Wallowa/ Enterprise.

Citing the study, Mike Cloughesy, OFRI director of forestry, said, "In the near term, thinning the most accessible timber stands in eastern and interior Southwest Oregon allows the harvest of about 600,000 tons of biomass annually, enough to produce 81 megawatts of electricity at the competitive cost of 6.5-cents per kilowatt hour."

Stan Watters, senior vice president of the electric utility PacifiCorp, said "Biomass is a renewable resource in our own backyard, and it will have an important role in meeting our customers' future energy needs."

Conference participants also heard the recommendations of the Oregon Forest Biomass Working Group, formed by Gov. Kulongoski, to improve forest health by accelerating the use of forest woody biomass as a value-added commodity and energy supply.

The working group's recommendations describe the path needed to address forest health concerns through the reduction of excess fuel loadings, particularly on federal land, while using some of the biomass to help Oregon meet its renewable energy goals.

The woody biomass conference, held at the World Forestry Center, was co-sponsored by OFRI, the Oregon Business Council, The Nature Conservancy, the Energy Trust of Oregon, the Oregon Forest Industries Council, and the Oregon Forest Biomass Working Group.

Hair of the Dog beverage 'hangover remedy'

When Red Bull splashed onto the U.S. market during the height of the dot-com mania in the mid-1990s, it heralded a new day for the beverage industry -- one that was not going to be fueled solely by alcohol and soda, but by a new type of thirst-quencher.

Today, caffeinated energy drinks still enjoy an enormous amount of success, capturing $3 billion worth of business in the $93 billion U.S. domestic beverage industry.

Now, one company, Innovative Technologies Corp. of America, is taking on the "big boys of energy drinks" by introducing several new beverages called Hair of the Dog. The name is derived from the concept of eliminating a hangover by drinking more of the same the next day.

Hair of the Dog energy formula does not contain alcohol; however, it can alleviate the side effects of alcohol by nutritionally supporting the detoxification process. It contains 1,000 milligrams of vitamin C, as well as B vitamins, ginseng and milk thistle. It also delivers 3,200 milligrams of Phase 1 and Phase 2 detoxifiers, which target the liver.
