OSU seeks LIFE recruits

The Center for Healthy Aging Research at Oregon State University (OSU) at Corvallis is recruiting volunteers for its LIFE Registry.

Any adult 50 or older who lives in Oregon can sign up for the registry. Once in it, participants agree to receive information about opportunities to participate in OSU studies designed to understand the health and well-being of middle-aged and older adults.

Participation does not obligate volunteers to be in any study. It simply provides OSU researchers affiliated with the center contact information for people who would like to receive information about studies.

Once information about a study is received, registry volunteers decide whether or not they would like to participate. The registry will include volunteers of all backgrounds.

There are no health requirements. The LIFE Registry matches volunteers with appropriate study opportunities within the Center for Healthy Aging Research. Some 40 OSU faculty members may use registry volunteers for various studies, which would be directed to the center's four core areas of research and might include: biological processes, exercise, balance, diet, families, psychological processes or new technologies.

Registry information is confidential and will be released only to Center for Healthy Aging Research faculty and their staff, OSU said.

More information is available at hhs.oregonstate.edu/

Tax credits

Nemmers' agency launched the campaign after learning that many families do not apply for the tax credit benefits. According to her, the IRS estimates that "at least 20 to 25 percent of taxpayers leave thousands of dollars on the table just from the federal Earned Income Tax Credit."

"Many families are not aware of the tax credits or don't know where to find help preparing their taxes," Nemmers said.

Summaries of the tax credits and sites where families can find free help are at oregonchildcare.org, and callers may obtain general information about the credits by phoning the network's toll-free line, (800) 342-6712.
