can expect soon, he said.

However, regarding if the company plans to upgrade the Emergency Broadcast System, he replied, "Not that I know of."

Regarding regulating agencies that control the cable industry, according to Bob Jenks of the Citizens' Utility Board of Oregon, cable companies are largely deregulated due to the federal Telecommunications Act of 1996. What regulation remaining falls on the local authority.

In the case of Cave Junction, that is the city; and outside the city limits, it appears that Josephine County is in charge.

According to Jenks, the history is that cable companies applied to local governments (cities or counties) for a franchise to install cable. Local governments typically granted the franchises with conditions that the cable company get approval from local government whenever it wanted to raise rates; that the cable provider connect the entire community rather than just a handful of neighborhoods; and that the cable company provide some level of public access programming.

The '96 Telecom Act took away local governments rights to approve rates for most cable services, which was the core of local regulation. Some communities, such as Portland, have continued to have cable regulatory agencies which review mergers/acquisitions, cable access and some terms and conditions (how fast is service restored...). Other communities, since they no longer could set rates, have largely removed themselves from cable regulation.

Beyond local government, the Federal Communications Commission has some authority over cable companies, but it does not have rate-setting power, and it has proven itself unwilling to use its power to protect consumers.

For local cable customers there is a new company in town, PC One Cable. But due to deregulation, it could be seen as a buyer beware situation.
