

Unionization curbs animal control move

By SCOTT JORGENSEN
IVN Staff Writer

Despite discussions of transferring Josephine County's Animal Control operations to the sheriff's office, such a deal will not be taking place.

At least, not right away.

Turning those operations over to the sheriff's office would require Animal Control employees to be unionized, which could become costly for the county, said Belle Shepherd, interim manager of Josephine County Public Health Division. Further complicating the issue is the county's overall financial woes.

“What was determined was that (unionization) would be an additional cost if we did go that route,” Shepherd said. “We’re deciding to hold off the transition for now to look at both the potential funding from the levy (a public safety levy election May 15) and the other issue related to the union cost of transferring.”

Shepherd said that although the transfer will not occur immediately, it is still a possibility, and that a final decision has yet to be made.

“I won’t say that it’s no deal whatsoever, but our prediction right now is that we’re not going to make any changes before the end of the fiscal year (June 30), but will determine before then if we’re going to make changes or not,” Shepherd said.

“We want to make sure it’s going to be a smooth process if we do end up transitioning them over,” she said.

She added that internal changes still are being made at Animal Control, and that the program is still being streamlined to improve operational efficiencies.

Animal Control still will work with the sheriff's office on other matters, Shepherd said, but will remain under Public Health for the time being.

“They’ve been with Public Health since 1994, so there’s not a dire need to change over if it’s going to support the sheriff’s office, because they’re still doing that,” Shepherd said.

“But there are a lot of things they’ll be coordinating on regardless of whether they go,” she concluded.
