

CJ’s Mayor Tony Paulsen sees crime as big issue; cites lack of financial support

Rite Auto Parts.
Recent controversy concerning developments in Cave Junction city limits by Manor Communities Development LLC, of California, was cited as another example of the council’s limitations.
Paulson said that public perception that the council is a “rubber stamp” for the company is unfair. He emphasized the restrictions set on the council by state laws. Manor Communities Development is represented by Larry Osborn, a developer; and Carlyle Stout III, a Medford real estate attorney.

As for legalities involved, the mayor emphasized that “myself and my staff are making sure that he (Osborn) is doing everything he needs to be doing.”

Paulson stated that rumors of an Albertson’s being slated for construction at the north end of the city are unfounded. He said that as yet the council has not been approached by any businesses or corporations.

He did say that the city recently tried to entice a cheese factory to come to Cave Junction.
The cheese-and-wine connection seemed promising, but the factory eventually went to Klamath Falls even though the costs would have been lower in Illinois Valley, the mayor said.

Concerning the limited fiscal outlook for the city, Paulson said that he is exploring options. But, he added, all too often the city is “begging from Josephine County” and with the “anti-tax sentiment” demonstrated by citizens he isn’t optimistic.
Accordingly, Paulson said that he will be “a real thorn in the side” of the Three Rivers School District Board if it tries to implement an “impact tax” on new construction as authorized by Senate Bill 1036. The district board will need an intergovernmental agreement with the city to collect the tax, and Paulson indicated that he would oppose such an agreement.

He stated that the city could not impose such a tax, and that he does not feel that the school district should be allowed to do so either.
