Family uprooted from pot

Jason McMillen
IVN Contributing Writer

Danielle Adorno and Chris Cono have been living in Cave Junction for the past six years but will soon be forced out of their home due to the landlord having sold the rental out from underneath them to a hopeful marijuana farmer. “It’s sad and we almost feel like as a family we’re being forced out of Cave Junction,” Adorno said before continuing, “We’re good people, we pay our rent, we don’t ever get late fees, we don’t ever not have our rent or excuses. We just want a nice place for our family to live.”

Their family is to be moved out of the property by Dec. 4 and includes four Pomeranian Chihuahua’s, two cats, three children, plus, of course, the parents.

They received the notice in August but so far had to be granted two extensions from the original date in October because of the difficulty in finding a new property in the area in which to reside.

Adorno is temporarily disabled but will soon be released and allowed to start working again at the Home and Stead Senior Care facility in Grants Pass. Her husband, Cono, is permanently disabled because he broke his back and neck. Before living at their current residence they lived on Shadowbrook Drive, Cave Junction, for almost four years but that house was foreclosed on and they had to move out. When questioned about her thoughts on the “green rush” that has been greatly affecting the area, especially in terms of housing, she stated that, “It’s made it difficult for most of the people to find a place to rent or to even buy because they’re all being bought up. Rent is up from everyone growing marijuana. I don’t have anything against the marijuana and I don’t want to talk bad about it but it has made it very difficult for families like us to find somewhere to live with our family.”

The main issue with their being uprooted is the school situation for their children. They don’t want to have to tear their children away from their life and friends and have to essentially start over in a new area. “Our kids have been at the same schools for 10 years and our daughter is a senior this year and it would be devastating to have to pull her out as a senior when she wants to graduate with her class and her school.”

“It hurts, I’m tired of crying. I really am.” Adorno said, summing up the emotional situation of the household.
