Bud Junction aims to educate

Jason McMillen
IVN Contributing Writer

Bud Junction, a dispensary in Kerby that sells both recreational and medical cannabis products, opened its doors Aug. 14 and aims to set the standard of what a dispensary should be to its customers, employees, local community, environment and cannabis culture as a whole. Kriss Williams, an Idaho resident and owner of Bud Junction, said that he's currently in the process of making his store an official Oregon Liquor Control Commission "example" for other potential dispensary owners to follow.

Eager to assist the community wherever possible, Bud Junction offers a 20 percent discount to local residents who can prove that they live in the area.

Williams, wanting his business to be strongly correlated with cannabis related education, makes a point to tutor his staff rigorously. His motivation for doing so stems primarily from his belief that there's still a lot of negative stigma, possibly arising from misinformation, surrounding cannabis as it comes out of prohibition.

To encourage people to get their facts straight and further their knowledge of the plant, Bud Junction hosts two weekly events after which attendees can claim a discount: Mentor

Mondays (15 percent) and Take a Test Tuesdays (20 percent). Mentor Mondays feature a lecture while Take a Test Tuesday offers the opportunity for those who attended the lecture to take a test on it for a further discount.

Before founding Bud Junction, Williams' first foray into the cannabis industry, he owned a marketing consultant service for nearly 12 years. One of his more noteworthy accomplishments was his involvement in bringing Mixed Martial Arts (MMA) to Idaho. After stepping away from marketing, he dove into the tech industry with a good friend out of California as his partner. Now that the business is self-sustaining, he had the opportunity to move on to other projects.

Williams got his first taste of the cannabis industry working as a consultant for local dispensaries in the Illinois Valley. With his interest piqued, he sat down with his family, accountant, and lawyer and decided to give cannabis a shot.

"I always get really excited about any new industry," Williams said, "For example when cellphones became really popular I had a cellphone store in Boise—same with MMA." Williams has plans to open up 10 more stores over the course of the next five years, two of them in Oregon. He also has plans to buy a house in the area so that he and his family can more easily make extended visits to his new business.

In the future, Williams would like to clean up and level out the dispensary's property with the end goal being an attached 10,000 square foot indoor grow site. Although the grow site would be primarily for the commercial cultivation of cannabis, Williams would also like to have public tours so that he can further educate the public. Williams, having already gotten approval from the OLCC, is currently working with the county to get the green light to proceed.
