Illinois Valley News

Only a few small patches of snow remain on the higher slopes of El Capitan, the massive, magnificent mountain that stands guard over Young's Valley. Just a short distance to the east its 6,800' face looms impressively high and handsome above this great flowery mountain meadow that the Gardner gang (which includes me) considers their favorite summer stamping ground, an irresistibly attractive area that we've almost come to look upon as a miniature mountain Valhalla.

This is the fascinating alpine flower garden that draws us like a magnet several times during

Last weekend my gang came up from the beach and joined me in Young's Valley for another 2-day session of our favorite pastime, casing the hideaways of the mountain wild plants that we can hear whispering tantalizingly on the peaks all around but that become

In Velalova Swale we found to our surprise a small colony of the tiny pink-faced Brewer's mimulus, a new location for this diminutive figwort family member. Beside pocket-sized Puff-puff Lake, we also noted a new location for the rare

Business and home demand much of our time and attention of course, but when we're up in the mountains things down below seem to lose for a time some of their wearisome importance. And that is one of the very good reasons for packing up your camping gear and climbing up among the lovely peaks and high meadows now and then.

A snag on El Capitan.

“The spot fire got away and ran up the hill, we cannot do anything about it,” Long said, explaining that with “heavy fuels” and “steep terrain” that the next best option is to utilize local knowledge, south of Selma and down toward Cave Junction, where a new line will be burned out.

Complicating matters, Long explained how the fire simmers down under heavy smoke - but that smoke also grounds aircraft. Then, when winds clear things out, bringing opportunities to fly again, the
