Forenoon and Afternoon.

If the earth's orbit were laid out upon paper and, by astronomical calculations, an exact proportionate section were marked off for each solar day of the year, the variable lengths of orbit for the different days of the year would plainly appear to the eye. By referring to the foregoing earth's orbit laid out on paper, with the true solar days marked off in sections of mathematical exactness, it will be seen that by dividing each section into two equal parts and marking the division points with red ink, the true noon point of each solar day in the year will be conspicuous upon the drawing and in its proportionate relations in every way. If now we set a pair of dividers or compasses so that the opening shall reach over the exact space on the orbit of one-half of the mean solar day, and beginning at the red noon point of one of the four days in the year when the true noon falls at just 12 o'clock, say December 24th, and step the divider around on the orbit, making a blue point mark at each second step, then as the blue points vary from the red, so will the mean time which our clocks keep vary from the true noon of each day of the year. Variation of forenoon and afternoon, therefore, may be viewed by common intelligence, not only as a fact, but as a necessity.—[C. F. Dowd in Popular Science Monthly.

Small Beginnings.

In the year 1816, two women working in the factories at Lyons, France, organized among their associates a society for the "Propagation of the (Roman Catholic) Faith," each member agreeing to contribute one cent a week out of her scanty wages. Last year the receipts of that society were, $1,340,184.27, which were distributed throughout the world for the "Propagation of the Faith." Never despise the day of small things.
