The World from Puget Sound

From here the world is an undefinable color of mountains and water changing from blue to grey between the occasions when the Sound spins so quickly that birds are trapped flying sideways in the current, then flattens itself like a vast grey desert.

When I'm standing still, a center to a storm of swirling blue shapes, where even sound is curved, human contact remains outside the perimeter of spinning.

But when I see this landscape as a desert, there are no perimeters, and people walk freely across the flat water, women with yellow hats holding their colored shoes in their hands, men moving slowly dragging their shadows behind them, and myself, each of us occasionally bumping up against one another.
