Back From the River

Rotating slowly while my mind's eye brings me to the ground, to earth Sitting in a tin box, much to see passing by - an old broken down school bus

 CANNON BEACH

Drops of water rolling down my stomach, sand in my buttox, green - flowing on by An old sheet metal box, the housing for rusting electric wires - a bird lands upon it, it continues to rust.

A porch, old and wooden, here and there, decrepit brooms, leaning near more remnants of people now gone - appearing that way as if many years had gone by without anything moving

Swaying roadside weeds, dancing in the breeze, being cooled from the almost sweetering sun on a lazy Georgia day.

Above, a glistening speck of flinting light as my tin box covers this county's spiderweb of highways

I float back to the skies

The Golden Cord

There is a golden cord like manacles or faerie chain that wraps around the world and in our brains. It knots it up, it ties it down, you know, you cut it you go mad they say. For once you see that tassel hanging loose like snakes you cannot get it back to how it was -- Christ! to see inside the life of things -- the slope of rock that falls beneath the sea, the sparrow's wild heart, your eyes. Your eyes.

To fall in is natural, it is natural to fall, and not to float until they toss you from the shore that golden cord that binds you to your ignorance, that retakes you,
 and makes you for the moment sane.
