Considering the lives of heroes, I detect a common thread. Of -- for instance -- thread. Winding through a labyrinth, perhaps. And then there's fleece, or a sword stuck in a stone. Or magic apples, or a chalice. Or a crown. The lives of heroes are full of props for them to practice their heroic will upon. But considering my own life I see a dearth of such accoutrements. There is an absence here. Things could be found, made to fit within the boundaries of this mirthless quest. There is blood inside a bony breast. There are eyes filled with dew. There are two thin and trembling hands, trembling at the memory of you. And there is joy in words, like birds mating in the sky.

Mostly there is still, somewhere, desire. Desire not to break another heart, especially my own. Desire to breathe the morning air, to laugh, to sit inside a sunset. Desire to tie these rusticated bits together, with a thread found in a labyrinth, perhaps, and walk out whole again. Not a hero, no, but hopefully a man

--Bill Clunie
