

The Theatre

by Sick Null

The auditorium walls reverberate
with the tones of a thousand concerts long since passed.
These walls have ears,
and throats.
Listen closely. Press your ear
to the faded drapes
and lightly place your hand
against its soft folds.
Behind the curtain the old red brick wall
will softly begin to hum to you—
in the voices of a thousand singers,
men and women
scattered by the wind
into graveyards across the country,
across the world.
Their epitaphs have long since faded away, their names
no longer known or spoken.
But here, in the seemingly silent hall,
with your head pressed against the wall....
They are singing for you.
In harmony. In unison.

Bare Walls

by Eileen Vizenor

Bare walls upon entry.
Bare walls soon become a tapestry of pictures, poems and memories.
Bare walls hold our secrets.
Bare walls become life, past and present.
Bare walls to confide in.
Bare walls to think and ponder.
Bare walls to say goodbye to.
Bare walls become just a memory.
