LIME-SULFUR CONTROLS
 MILDW ON GOOSEBERRY

Mildew sprays on gooseberries must be applied immediately to be effective, reports H. F. Bars, plant pathologist at the experiment station. The before-blossom sprays control mildew without leaving sulfur on the fruit when developed.
 Sulfur on the berry makes them unfit for canning, according to cannerymen. A large percentage of "springers" or bulged cans develop when berries with sulfur on are put up. Even though the caps may not show outward effects of the sulfur, the product is not considered fit for merchandising.

Complete control of mildew has been obtained by use of before-blossom sprays in experimental work on the planting of two Benton county farmers—W. L. Powell of Kiger Island and W. W. Stover of Corvallis. The first spray, lime sulfur 1 to 25, is put on before the blossom opens. It is followed two weeks later by a second spray, and this by a third spray in 10 days to two weeks if it can be put on before the blossom opens.
 If dry lime-sulfur is used it is mixed with water at the rate of 4 pounds to 25 gallons. With these sprays a thorough treatment is essential to success, the station-farmer experiments show. The solution must drench every part of the plant.

The mildew fungus hibernates in the leaf bud and if allowed to become established in the growing leaf will produce spores that may infect the berry. Since it is then too late to protect the fruit without putting sulfur on it, thereby damaging it for canning, the sprays must be put on early enough and often enough to keep the disease from starting on the leaf.

Great Care Taken Against Foreign Animal Diseases

The painstaking care taken by Federal veterinary officials to exclude animal diseases from abroad is shown in the close supervision over numerous commercial products. While all possible avenues of danger to the livestock of the United States have received regular inspection, additional safeguards are being added. For instance, fragile articles, such as china and bric-a-brac, imported in large quantities, require careful packing, and for this purpose it has been customary in the past to use hay and straw. It is considered that such packing material, when originating in a country where foot-and-mouth disease exists, may carry infection; consequently official regulations require the destruction of foreign packing material of that sort upon arrival from an infected country unless accompanied by certificates of approved disinfection issued by American consular officers in the country of origin.

But as a further means of tightening the quarantine against animal diseases from abroad, the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, reports success in efforts to have hay and straw replaced by packing of nonagricultural origin. Many importing firms, says the bureau, have arranged with shippers in foreign countries to use excelsior and paper for packing. Imported hides and skins receive thorough disinfection and every possible precaution is taken in connection with the importation of animal by-products and feeding materials. The Treasury Department and other branches of the Government having to do with imports are cooperating with the Bureau of Animal Industry in its work of excluding animal contagion.
