There's more than one way to handle a father-in-law

SOMEONE had told Dick Slocum's father that Felice was horribly extravagant, and, to one of his parsimonious inclinations, that was enough. So when they were married he gave them a check to furnish the living room. Two hundred dollars! That stung Felice into action. She simply haunted the second-hand stores and old barns. Every day found her with a can of Acme Quality Varnolac, at work on some new "find." When Mr. Slocum made his first visit, the living room was ready. Charming, it was—all soft-toned dark woods—quaint little tables, odd bookshelves and handsome old chairs. Mr. Slocum looked a bit surprised when he saw the room, and still more surprised when Felice told him that she had put the one hundred dollars left over into a bond. Now, when anyone comments on Felice's new closed car, she says "Oh, that's one of the things Dick's father gave me before he left."
