Early Picking Controls Core Breakdown of Pears

Pear growers of the Willamette Valley may protect their fruit from core breakdown by early picking. Investigations by Henry Hartman of the college experiment station indicate that Bartlett pears picked when the pressure test shows a pressure of 27 pounds or more show approximately no core breakdown, even after the fruit has been in cold storage for as much as 125 days.

Tests were made with other leading pear valleys of the district showing that when the fruit is picked before it is too mature very little core breakdown trouble is encountered.

Willamette Valley growers seem to suffer more from breakdown trouble than growers of eastern and southern Oregon. This, Mr. Hartman thinks, is because the valley growers assume that their season is three weeks later than the southern Oregon season, and that they should pick their pears three weeks later. This is an error, as the later valley season more nearly coincides with the season in southern Oregon.

The pressure test for determining the stage of maturity at which the fruit should be picked was developed by the Oregon station and has proved to be a reliable guide in determining the time of pear harvest. The breakdown shows first as a water condition near the core of the pear which later develops into a dark soft area which soon spreads throughout the fruit. So far as is known it is not a bacterial but physiological condition not yet fully understood.
