It's a good thing those Putnam boys are going back to school next week

You heard the latest exploit, didn't you? Left the water running in the bath tub and ruined the living room wall. Just redecorated, it was, and Mrs. Putnam knew she couldn't ask to have it done over. But her cousin Jim, the decorator, said if the boys would buy the Acme Quality No-Lustre Finish he would do over the walls himself. Mrs. Putnam says now she isn't sorry it happened—the wall is simply lovely—and she has learned something about wall finishes she wishes she had known years ago.

Guard Training Camps Held

Detailed methods of preventing and fighting forest fires was the chief order of business at the forest guard training camps for the summer protective force which have just been held on the various National Forests of Oregon and Washington.

Each summer the U. S. Forest Service expands its organization to meet the forest fire hazard. Men for these protective positions are drawn from the various forestry schools, and from the local woodsmen, stockmen, ranchers and homesteaders who live in the vicinity of the National Forests. Before they go on duty for actual protective work, the spring training camp is held, where the temporary fire force is given practical tests on the ground. New equipment is explained and tried out, theoretical fires are fought, organization plans are coordinated, and ideas exchanged.

"We feel that these camps are a valuable part of our forest fire work", said Mr. A. O. Waha, Assistant District Forester in charge of fire protection. "We want every guard, lookout and fireman to know exactly what his job is, how he is to handle it, just where he fits into the organization, and be ready to meet any emergency. We can't always prevent the public from starting forest fires so we always try to handle the fires as quickly and efficiently as possible when they do get started."

Mr. Waha further pointed out that this protective force works on forest roads, trails and other improvements when they are not busy with fires, and added that if the public would help prevent forest fires, the Forest Service would have much more time for other constructive work.

Better Newspapers

Better newspapers was the theme emphasized at the recent convention of the National Editorial Association held at Richmond, Va. At this session a code of ethics was adopted, the keynote of which is service to the community. While the publishing of a newspaper is a private enterprise, conducted primarily for profit, it is generally conceded that the newspaper is a quasi-public institution which owes its success to the amount of public service rendered to the community.

The weekly newspaper is a mirror in which is reflected the life of the community which it serves. The stranger judges the community by the kind of a newspaper it supports and good or bad impressions are gained from its columns.

A most important impression is that gained from the amount of advertising contained in its columns, as it indicates very accurately the business activities of the place. A newspaper filled with live advertising shows that the town has live merchants and offers good business facilities.

Better newspapers are already an accomplished fact. All over the country there has been a marked improvement in recent years in the quality of the newspapers published. They are better printed, better edited, and better serve the community than they formerly did. The local newspaper business has become more businesslike and has become as firmly established from a business point of view as have the banks, the stores, or the industrial establishments.

Much impetus has been gained through co-operative effort as initiated by the various press associations, both state and national. The publisher who attends such conventions gets a wide view of the profession as a whole and gets a better understanding of what the newspaper profession stands for.

code of ethics established for his guidance, if he establishes his paper as an educational force supporting the moral and physical welfare of the community to the utmost extent of his ability, he deserves to rank high in his profession and to be reckoned as an asset comparable with the churches and the schools.

The first duty of the publisher is to support law and order, to build up those institutions which tend to create better public spirit, a higher ideal of civic duty and individual responsibility. To fall short in this duty is to fail to hit the mark which establishes newspaper publishing as a profession. No matter how successful the publisher may be financially, yet a newspaper must be successful financially as well as ethically to make it respected.

Every profession benefits by a code of ethics. The individual who has no code for his guidance is apt to become an outcast in his profession, looked upon with suspicion by his associates, and often fails to gain the respect secured by others who take their responsibilities more seriously.

The Massachusetts Press association has established a code of ethics which has served as a model for other states, and many of its principals are embodied in the code established by the national organization. Thus Massachusetts continues as a leader in the cause of public betterment for the cause of "Better Newspapers."—Wareham (Mass.) Courier.

Succession vegetable crops for fall and winter use, such as cabbage, cauliflower, brussels sprouts, kale, broccoli, and celery, can be set out on ground cleared of the early maturing crops. By making suitable plans and carrying them out promptly the Oregon garden or farm or country lot may be made to perform double duty. Provision may also be made for successive seeding of radish and lettuce, designated by the experiment station as important all the year vegetables.
