National Forest Recreation Increasing

Forest Service View Given by Associate Forester Sherman

The use of the National Forests for public recreation has grown so fast and has become such a big factor in their management, especially in fire control, that a question has arisen as to both the desirability and the authority of the Forest Service to permit and encourage such use. On this question Associate Forester E. A. Sherman, who is now in the Northwest, says:

"Before the National Forests were thought of, the people of the surrounding country used these areas, so far as conditions permitted, for recreation; after the establishment of the Forests they simply continued this use and expanded it with the growth of population and the increased accessibility of the areas. The Forest Service did not create the idea of recreational use of the National Forests; rather the public came in of its own accord, each year in increasing numbers, and the Forest Service recognizing that recreation was a resource, like timber and water, used its best efforts to see that it was so handled as to make the greatest returns to the national welfare consistent with the chief purposes for which the Forests were established.

"The National Forests embrace parts of every mountain system and almost every forest region in the United States; they form the natural outlets of large populations, to which they are the logical, near-by, economically enjoyed fields for outdoor sport and recreation. To millions of people the National Forests are the natural and sometimes the only available playgrounds, other than their city parks. It is most vital to them that these areas should remain open for recreational purposes; but in this day of motors and good roads, even the citizens of regions remote from the National Forests have a direct personal interest in recreation grounds where they can feel free to camp and enjoy themselves in their own way, so long as they obey the rules of good citizenship and good sportsmanship while in the woods.

"Recreational use is not inconsistent with forest management, but to the contrary is a common by-product of such management. In the public and private forests of other countries, with long established systems of forest management, public use for recreation is thoroughly recognized as an important form of land service. In this country, where the inclusion within forest units of small areas clearly most valuable for recreation is unavoidable, and where economic and industrial needs ultimately will require co-ordinated use of every available resource, the correlation of recreation with forest management is even more desirable and necessary than elsewhere. In view of this, the logical, the inevitable conclusion is that one of the proper functions of the National Forests is to afford the people of the United States opportunity for outdoor recreation; that one of the proper functions of the Forest Service is to administer the recreational use of the National Forests in proper co-ordination with other forms of use; that the expenditure of Department of Agriculture appropriations in the development of recreational facilities on the National Forests, to the fullest extent authorized by Congress and compatible with other public needs, is a proper use of such appropriations."

plants—leaf, stem, and root—and also gnaw into such fruits as apples and tomatoes. Calls for help have come by the hundreds to the experiment station and to county agents. Poison bran mash made as follows is the control recommended:

Mix 15 pounds of coarse bran with 10 ounces of paris green and 1 pint of salt. Dilute 1 pint of syrup with enough water to make a moist crumbly mash such as will fall apart when dropped from the hand. Scatter this mash about the plants and over the infested ground, where the worms will find and eat it on their way to the plants.

This bait is preferred by the worms to the plants and is speedily eaten. It is likewise quickly fatal.

The variegated cutworm is almost always present, but its numbers are kept down by its natural enemies—a fly that lays an egg in the worm, and birds, fowls, and even pigs. In favorable seasons it gets the jump on these and then destroys millions of dollars worth of crops unless checked by man. It was a bad pest in 1900 and in 1914, doing in one year 2½ million dollars worth of damage.

The grown worm is 1¾ inches long, rather fat, and of yellowish green to a dark brown color. It nearly always has a few light yellowish dots on the middle part of the back. It is hatched from the eggs of a rather large moth with grayish red-tipped front wings and clear white rear ones with soft brown edges. The eggs are laid in masses on plants and even the family washing. The worms come out in March and again in midsummer in larger numbers.
