Peat soils are generally low in potassium and phosphorus. Actual practice has shown that crops grown in these soils, especially potatoes and garden crops respond to the application of these materials. Peat land must be well drained before the application of the fertilizer is recommended.
 Farmers have reported difficulty in getting stands of red clover on red hill soil that formerly produced good clover. The experiment station recommends the application of ground limestone at the rate of two tons per acre, for the correction of the acidity, and a light application of phosphate fertilizers.

HOW TO CAN BROCCOLI
 DESCRIBED IN DETAIL
 With the coming of the broccoli season, many inquiries have been received by the horticultural products departments of the experiment station as to the best method of canning. Canned broccoli provides a nourishing and popular food and can be served in a variety of ways.
 Many like it with mayonnaise as a cold salad.
 Heads are first cleaned by removing leaves and portions unfit for canning. After curds (heads) are cut into large clusters and washed carefully, they are placed in 3 per cent brine at boiling point for 3 minutes.
 When cool the broccoli is packed into glass jars as firmly as possible without injuring and covered with 1 1/2 per cent brine boiling hot. The jars are then placed in a pressure cooker for 15 minutes at 10 pounds pressure and sealed immediately after being removed.
 When tin cans are used the brine, cooking process and pressure is the same. Cans are preheated in steam at 185 degrees to drive off the air before sealing. Use of enamel lined cans is recommended by the horticultural products department to prevent deposits on the broccoli. Best results are usually obtained by the use of 2 1/2 size with 17 1/2 ounces broccoli to the tin.
 The strong odor of canned broccoli is due to sulfides which pass off after the produce is removed from the can. It disappears more quickly upon heating.
 Custards taste better and have a more creamy texture if they are cooked at a low temperature.
 Raw spinach and hard cooked eggs make a new salad. This is an ideal way to take a spring sulphur and iron tonic.
 Iron from a vegetable source, like spinach, is more readily assimilated by the body than that in iron capsules or an iron tonic. The garden variety is also much cheaper.

Two Kinds of Silage
 Now Grown Each Year
 A combination of oats and vetch has been found one of the best silage crops for western Oregon. Experiment station results show that it out yields corn on the heavier, poorly drained soils. More milk was produced from this silage than from corn or sunflowers, according to trials. Cows like it better than sunflowers, but corn is equal to it from the standpoint of palatability. Corn is used with good results as a late season cultivated silage crop, says the experiment station.
 Oats and vetch can be planted in the fall when more time is available.
 Vetch is a legume and therefore a soil builder. It requires no cultivation after sowing. The experiment station recommends a planting of 60 to 80 pounds of common vetch and 40 pounds of gray winter oats per acre.
 Corn is recommended as a rotation crop to produce two silage crops each season. Oats and vetch are cut in June when the oats are in the dough stage, while the corn is harvested later, after much of the early silage has been used. This permits double use of the silo. A well cultivated corn field is easily prepared for oats and vetch the following season by disking. Corn is the only large cultivated crop that permits the killing of weeds, says the experiment station.
