ASKING AN OUTLET

(Editorial in Oregon Journal)

Southern and southwestern Oregon are in numbers and strength before the Portland hearing as petitioners for the cross-state railroad.

There are representatives from Jackson, Josephine and Curry counties in Oregon and Del Norte county, California. They seek a more direct outlet for their products bound east.

The witnesses at the hearing pointed out that producers and shippers of the section must have their products carried 300 miles north to Portland or 400 miles south to Roseville, California, before they are started eastward.

It was pointed out that in Josephine county are more than 40 kinds of useful minerals, including copper, iron and lime, a larger variety than is found in any district in the United States.

Witnesses showed that most of the great output of apples and pears in the great Rogue river valley are marketed in New York and London and move east by rail, but must now go by round-about routes, being hauled 300 to 400 miles north or south before starting eastward.

With $10,000,000 invested in the fruit business in Jackson county, witnesses from there urged more direct and more economical railroad connections and declared that the cross-state railroad would be such a route.

It is the appeal of good people for a railroad by which distances would be shortened, haulage of cars backward and forward be lessened, the wages of train crews over round-about routes be saved, and other economies be introduced in the transportation of their enterprise and life work.

When you look at the railroad map of Oregon and there see that the great central areas of the state as far west as the ocean have no direct eastern outlet, doesn't it make you reflect?

A TRAVELER'S HAVEN

"Reports have been circulated below the Oregon state line that the Roosevelt highway is impassable," says a Gold Beach news dispatch. "This is resulting in much coast travel being diverted to other highways and is seriously hurting Coos and Curry counties," the dispatch adds.

There is no more attractive highway than the Roosevelt route from the Oregon state line northward through Brookings, Gold Beach, Wedderburn, Port Orford, Bandon, Coquille, Marshfield and North Bend to Reedsport, 173 miles.

It is a smooth, hard road, picturesque and full of all the surprises of mingled mountain and shore line scenes. It has a lure and a beauty that thrills the traveler and that sends the tourist on to broadcast the charms of Oregon as a wonderland.

To picture Roosevelt highway as other than a splendid route harms all Oregon, in that it prevents travelers from seeing one phase of the state that can only be seen along the Oregon coast line.

By and by, the picturesque Oregon coast route will carry travelers in multitudes. Give it time, and it will tell its own history and herald its own attractions.—Oregon Journal.

What Rangers Do

A partial answer to the oft-repeated question, "What do forest rangers do when they are not fighting fires?" is given in the annual report of receipts for the fiscal year 1928, just issued by the district forester, Portland, Oregon.

According to this report, the 22 national forests of Oregon and Washington produced a revenue of $1,238,669.07 during the 12 months ending June 30, 1928. The largest part of this came from sales of national forest timber which brought in $985,278.55.

The field end of these transactions and most of the supervision are handled by forest rangers and forest supervisors on the ground. This is in addition to the work they do fighting fires and building roads, trails and other improvements.

According to the forest service, this revenue is produced from handling the forest as a renewable resource, to produce the greatest good to the greatest number. It is also pointed out that 25 cents out of every dollar of all of these receipts is returned to the states and counties for the road and school fund, while an additional 10 per cent is made available for use by the forest service for road

Educational Chats

By Dr. Arnold Bennett Hall President, University of Oregon

The influence of the schools in building moral standards and quickening moral perception in certain lines of thought and conduct gives promise of a trend toward a good when directed to the positive morality required by the civic duty of today. But so far most teachings have been negative and personal, ignoring the positive and social.

Few graduates of our public schools would blush with shame if detected in an act of dishonesty or personal immorality, but these same people would idly boast of an ignorance regarding the current issues of the ballot box and the capacity of the candidates of public office for whom they are asked to vote. Thousands of citizens will deplore the inefficiency and waste of government, while only tens will study out the responsible parties and apply the doctrine of strict accountability.

The cry for reform is always in the air, but when a concrete measure is suggested that asks a burden upon a group or class, they are too frequently willing to bear the burden. Thousands of these same persons would rally to the defense of their ideals of national honor, were it assailed by a common foe. But industry and disease may claim its daily toll of hundreds, through the inefficiency of democracy, and the public sits idly by. They have no conception of a nation's honor that calls for patriotic service in the cause of justice, righteousness and decency at home.

But the American people have not lost their ideals. They have not lost their capacity to respond to the call of human need. The instinct of sympathy and love of justice still smolder in every true American. The function of modern education is to show that with the change from a pioneer nation to an industrial state have come new problems and new demands upon the spiritual and moral forces of the nation. When these needs are brought home to the American youth; when he is taught to read in complex problems of the day a challenge to his manhood; when he is brought to realize that the most treacherous foes that assail his nation are the forces of greed, injustice and selfish indifference; when he is brought face to face with the gigantic problems of modern life with their challenge to his courage, his scholarship and his patriotism, the American youth will not be found wanting.

This, then, is the task that awaits the teacher as he stands before his group of young Americans. They must be brought face to face with the realities of life. They must learn that the price of liberty and justice and progress is eternal vigilance. The development of this vision and spirit of democracy is not the work of the moment to be done in time of pressing need. It is the slow and patient method of building into youthful thought the social viewpoint, and of guiding the dynamic instincts of the child into the channels of socialized activity.

New York.—An appreciable increase in the number of young people who fall prey to mental diseases is found by Dr. Meuns S. Gregory, head of the psychiatric department of Bellevue hospital.

People are more enlightened about the danger of letting mental and nervous ills gain headway, and as a result more youthful cases reach the hospital, he says, but this does not fully explain the increase.

"The higher standards of the present day are largely responsible," he states. "The demand for material luxuries is greater today than it has ever been. The longings of youth are more intricate, more difficult to attain. They are more likely to be thwarted. And an increase in thwarted longings and ambitions makes for an increase in abnormal mental and nervous states."

Britons Ask When Is Fresh Egg Fresh?

London.—When is a fresh egg fresh? That is what a committee appointed by the ministry of agriculture is trying to ascertain. The committee has had sittings with the National Farmers' union and the National Poultry council on the application of an order making the marking of imported eggs compulsory.

Many poultry dealers said they agreed that the age limit for a fresh egg was 14 days. A Leth importer however, said that he had frequently eaten Russian eggs, cooked in various ways, which were six weeks old, yet quite fresh.

Then said the chairman of the committee: "I don't suppose you'd say you got them from me, but rather by way of experience."
